

BURDENS OF JURISDICTIONAL PROOF

*LONNY SHEINKOPF HOFFMAN**

ABSTRACT .....	410
INTRODUCTION .....	410
I. CAFA’S TWO BURDEN OF PROOF QUESTIONS .....	413
A. THE THRESHOLD OR PRIMA FACIE BURDEN .....	414
B. SHIFTING THE BURDEN OF PROOF AS TO CAFA’S “EXCEPTIONS” .....	416
II. BEHIND THE CASES .....	419
A. THE ASSUMPTION THAT THE PLAINTIFF IS IN A BETTER POSITION TO ACCESS THE JURISDICTIONAL FACTS .....	419
B. OF LEGISLATIVE HISTORY AND LEGISLATIVE SPIRIT .....	421
C. The Resuscitation of Breuer v. Jim’s Concrete of Brevard, Inc. ..	424
D. ANALOGIZING CAFA’S PROVISIONS .....	429
E. TEXT AND CONTEXT .....	430
1. LOOKING AT TEXT .....	430
2. LOOKING AT CONTEXT .....	433
III. READING SECTIONS 1332(D)(3) AND (D)(4), AS WELL AS (D)(5) AND (D)(9), AS NON-WAIVABLE JURISDICTIONAL PROVISIONS .....	435
A. FOCUSING ON WAIVER .....	435
1. The Mandatory Language in CAFA .....	436
2. The Relevance of “Decline” .....	438
3. Jurisdictional v. Claims-Processing Rules .....	440
4. Legislating Against Backdrop of Existing Law .....	442
B. RECONCILING §§ 1332(d)(3) AND (d)(4) .....	443
CONCLUSION.....	445
APPENDIX .....	448

---

*. Visiting Professor, Vanderbilt University School of Law (spring 2008); George Butler Research Professor of Law, University of Houston Law Center. Thanks to Stephen Burbank, Aaron Bruhl, Kevin Clermont, Elizabeth Cabraser, Gregory Joseph, Geoffrey Miller, Richard Nagareda, Georgene Vairo and Patrick Woolley for their comments on an earlier draft of this Article. Professor Hoffman may be reached by email at LHoffman@central.uh.edu. The University of Houston Law Foundation provided necessary funding for this project.

ABSTRACT

Having passed the most significant legislative reform of complex litigation in American history, advocates of the Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA) have now set their sights on more technical battles of statutory interpretation and application. Their ambitions span a broad range: from trying to stretch the boundaries of CAFA's reach, in the first instance, to divining new principles in the conflict of laws which bear, ultimately, on the propriety of class certification. One of the most important questions with which courts are wrestling with regard to the Class Action Fairness Act concerns the burden of jurisdictional proof. In the broadest sense, the issue is who bears the burden of proving the existence (or nonexistence) of the federal district court's subject matter jurisdiction under the new statute. Traditionally, the party who desires to maintain the suit in federal court always has had the obligation of demonstrating the court's authority to hear the case. Reallocating some of that obligation so that the other side has to prove that federal jurisdiction is lacking constitutes a sea-change of enormous proportions. Yet, as to one aspect of the burden of proof under CAFA, this is exactly what the vast majority of courts—and every court of appeals to consider the question—has found Congress intended. It is already possible to see the impact that this reallocation is having on class action litigation. The empirical evidence, which is collected and reported in the Appendix to this Article, shows that reallocation of this burden of jurisdictional proof dramatically influences forum selection outcomes. In this Article I demonstrate that the arguments credited by courts, that Congress intended to shift some of the burden of proof onto the party opposing federal jurisdiction, rest on a number of highly suspect doctrinal and empirical assumptions. Against the prevailing view, the Article argues that there are sound reasons to conclude that CAFA does not shift any of the burden of jurisdictional proof from the party who desires to maintain the suit in federal court.

INTRODUCTION

This is a story only a lawyer could love. Having passed the most significant legislative reform of complex litigation in American history, advocates of the Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA)<sup>1</sup> have now set their sights on more technical battles of statutory interpretation and application. Their ambitions span a broad range: from trying to stretch the boundaries of CAFA's reach, in the first instance, to divining new principles in the conflict of laws which bear, ultimately, on the propriety of class certification.<sup>2</sup> Nuanced,

---

1. Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-2, 119 Stat. 4 (codified in scattered sections of 28 U.S.C.).

2. See Richard A. Nagareda, Aggregation and its Discontents: Class Settlement Pressure, Class-

dry, and lacking all of the fanfare that accompanied the highly-charged and politicized debate over the law's passage, these procedural questions of statutory meaning are being decided quietly, out of the headlines. Nevertheless, the stakes could not be higher. These interpretative contests are shaping CAFA's full breadth and scope. They are the law's bone and sinew.<sup>3</sup>

One of the most important questions with regard to CAFA concerns the burden of jurisdictional proof. In the broadest sense, the issue is who bears the burden of proving the existence (or nonexistence) of the federal district court's subject matter jurisdiction under the new statute. Traditionally, the party who desires to maintain the suit in federal court always has had the obligation of demonstrating the court's authority to hear the case.<sup>4</sup> Shifting some of the burden so that the other side (which, as a practical matter, means shifting the burden to the plaintiff, since a challenge to the federal court's authority occurs most often after the defendant has removed the case from state court and the plaintiff has asked that it be moved back) has to prove that federal jurisdiction is lacking constitutes a sea-change of enormous proportions. Yet, as to one aspect of the burden of jurisdictional proof, that is exactly what the vast majority of courts—and every court of appeals to consider the question—has found Congress intended.<sup>5</sup> This is the civil procedural equivalent of saying that criminal defendants are now guilty until proven innocent.

Congress, of course, cannot legislate all of the details that arise in the soft spots between the substantive provisions in the law. Indeed, it usually does not even try, leaving the courts to flesh these out as live controversies come before them. This ought not to deceive us into thinking there are few practical consequences that flow out of the procedural details that develop around the substantive law. It is already possible to see the impact that reallocation of some of the burden is having on class action litigation.

For the party who does not want to litigate in federal court, bearing the burden of jurisdictional proof has meant she has had a much harder time getting out of that forum. The proof is in the numbers. The Appendix to this Article contains two tables reporting win/loss rates in forum contests under wide Arbitration and CAFA, 106 COLUM. L. REV. 1872, 1876 (2006) (“By moving nationwide class actions involving state-law claims into federal court, the defense-side backers of CAFA were not engaged in a mere shell game. The point of moving such classes into federal court is to subject them to a distinctively federal body of class certification principles, and in so doing, to alter the outcomes of class certification decisions from what they otherwise would have been—at least in some courts within some state judicial systems.”).

---

3. Cf. A.L.A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 555 (1935) (“This is clear from the provisions of § 7a of the Act [15 U.S.C.A. § 707(a)] with its explicit disclosure of the statutory scheme. Wages and the hours of labor are essential features of the plan, its very bone and sinew.”); Legal Tender Cases, 79 U.S. (12 Wall.) 457, 564 (1870) (“The heart of the nation must not be crushed out. The people must be aided to pay their debts and meet their obligations. The debtor interest of the country represent its bone and sinew, and must be encouraged to pursue its avocations.”).

4. McNutt v. Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp. of Ind., Inc., 298 U.S. 178, 189 (1936); Wilson v. Republic Iron & Steel Co., 257 U.S. 92, 97 (1921).

5. See infra notes 18, 47, 58, 80–85.

CAFA.<sup>6</sup> Table 1 catalogues cases in the dataset where the court determined that CAFA shifts some of the burden of proof to the party opposing federal jurisdiction; Table 2 lists those where the court did not. When there was such a shift in the burden of proof, the party desiring to litigate in federal court prevailed on the forum contest in 80% of the cases reviewed (16 out of 20). Table 2 reports the converse: among the (smaller) set of cases not shifting the burden of jurisdictional proof, the success rate of the party in the identical position—the one desiring to litigate in federal court—declined to 30% (3 out of 10). These dramatic findings, albeit from a limited data set, are consistent with data Kevin Clermont and Ted Eisenberg have collected elsewhere regarding reported CAFA cases<sup>7</sup> and provide support for the conclusion that where one of CAFA's jurisdiction limiting provisions—28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(d)(3), (d)(4), (d)(5) or (d)(9)—is at issue, allocation of the burden of proof is a key determinant in the forum contest's outcome. In light of other, recent decisions (both specific to CAFA<sup>8</sup> and more broadly<sup>9</sup>) that have heightened the importance of the pleading stage and of gathering adequate pre-filing discovery, reallocation of some of the burden may soon become virtually dispositive in terms of forum selection outcomes. What this means is that so long as choice of forum matters<sup>10</sup>—a proposition that was, importantly, a foundational premise behind CAFA's passage<sup>11</sup>—placement of the jurisdictional burden of proof will continue to be of enormous consequence to forum selection and, by extension, to case outcomes,

---

6. See infra Appendix.

7. Kevin M. Clermont & Theodore Eisenberg, CAFA Judicata: A Tale of Waste and Politics, 156 U. PA. L. REV. (forthcoming 2007) (copy of August 23, 2007 draft on file with author).

8. See Lowery v. Ala. Power Co., 483 F.3d 1184, 1215–18, 1221 (11th Cir. 2007) (emphasizing claimant's obligations under FED. R. CIV. P. 8 and 11, as well as defendant's pleading obligations in its notice of removal, and further determining that no jurisdictional discovery is permissible under CAFA).

9. See Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1966 (2007) (holding that to survive a motion to dismiss the plaintiff's antitrust claim must allege facts that "plausibly" suggest existence of a conspiracy). See generally Scott Dodson, Pleading Standards After Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 93 VA. L. REV. IN BRIEF 121, 122 (2007), available at <http://www.virginialawreview.org/inbrief/2007/07/09/dodson.pdf>.

10. See Kevin M. Clermont & Theodore Eisenberg, Do Case Outcomes Really Reveal Anything About the Legal System? Win Rates and Removal Jurisdiction, 83 CORNELL L. REV. 581, 581–82 (1998) (providing empirical evidence that forum selection between state and federal court impacts case outcomes); see also Thomas E. Willging & Shannon R. Wheatman, Attorney Choice of Forum in Class Action Litigation: What Difference Does it Make?, 81 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 591, 593 (2006) ("Lawyers commonly perceive that choosing a forum in a class action is a critical element of litigating such a case."); Georgene M. Vairo, Judge-Shopping, NAT. L.J., Nov. 27, 2000, at A16 ("Any good plaintiff's lawyer should consider what forum is best for resolving a client's dispute, and a good defense attorney deserves a client if no attention is paid to removing or transferring or otherwise shifting the case to a different jurisdiction that would be a better forum for protecting the client's interests.").

11. Lonny Sheinkopf Hoffman, The "Commencement" Problem: Lessons From a Statute's First Year, 40 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 469, 471 (2006) ("By its intended effect the statute [CAFA] authorizes the removal of state class action suits previously outside the jurisdictional reach of the federal courts."); Nagareda, supra note 2, at 1876 ("The primary thrust of CAFA is simply to amend the federal diversity jurisdiction statute in order to make it easier for defendants to remove class actions involving state-law claims—particularly nationwide class actions—from state court to federal court.").

as well.<sup>12</sup> Yet, Congress said not one word in this detailed jurisdictional statute about who bears what burden before the court.

In this Article, I describe, in Part I, how a statute that is entirely silent on the question of jurisdictional proof under CAFA has come to spawn two different burden of proof debates, producing, most remarkably, two opposing answers. In Part II, I then consider all of the arguments credited by courts that have adjudged that Congress intended to shift a part of the burden of proof onto the party opposing federal jurisdiction. I will endeavor to show that these arguments rest on a number of highly suspect doctrinal and empirical assumptions. Against the prevailing view, I argue in Part III that there are sound reasons to conclude that CAFA does not shift any of the burden of jurisdictional proof from the party who desires to maintain the suit in federal court.

I have two ultimate ambitions for this Article. In looking carefully at this vital question of statutory interpretation, my immediate aim is to offer a perspective different from what has become the established wisdom with regard to CAFA and, thereby, to widen and improve upon existing thinking. More broadly, I also hope this study may offer some analytic clarity which can be drawn upon when future battles erupt over procedural questions of statutory meaning that lie, commonly and unavoidably, in the soft spots of the law where Congress rarely legislates.

I. CAFA'S TWO BURDEN OF PROOF QUESTIONS

With CAFA's passage, Congress expanded the original jurisdiction of the federal courts to now encompass class action lawsuits that, prior to the statute's passage, were confined to state court. This legislative accomplishment was achieved through the introduction of two key statutory features: aggregation of the monetary value of claims and a minimal diversity of citizenship threshold.<sup>13</sup> For any putative class action case, the claims of all class members are to be added together and, if the sum exceeds $5,000,000

---

12. We should not be surprised to discover, then, that CAFA's supporters are interested in influencing case outcomes, even if the statute formally speaks only of expanding federal jurisdictional reach. See Stephen B. Burbank, The Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 in Historical Context: A Preliminary View, 157 U. PA. L. REV. (forthcoming 2007), available at <http://www.pennumbra.com/symposia/drafts/at83> ("We know that some of CAFA's supporters were not seeking different class action law so much as they were different attitudes towards class certification. They hoped that many of the putative class actions removed under CAFA would be denied certification and go away."); Tobias Barrington Wolff, Federal Jurisdiction and Due Process in the Era of the Nationwide Class Action, 157 U. PA. L. REV. (forthcoming 2007), available at <http://www.pennumbra.com/symposia/drafts/at2> ("This expansion of diversity jurisdiction, in turn, is an expression of the instinct that lies at the Act's foundation: the belief that federal courts will apply different and more restrained standards to the administration of class actions than will state courts, providing greater confidence that the interests of parties on both sides of the dispute will be protected from abuse. The shift to the federal forum, in other words, is expected and intended to alter the outcome in class litigation based on state law.") For one discussion of how forum selection can influence case outcomes, see Lonny Sheinkopf Hoffman, Removal Jurisdiction and the All Writs Act, 148 U. PA. L. REV. 401, 401-07 (1999), which was recently cited by the Supreme Court in Syngenta Crop Prot., Inc. v. Henson, 537 U.S. 28, 35 n.* (2002) (Stevens, J., concurring).

13. See 28 U.S.C.A. § 1332(d)(2) (2006).

exclusive of interest and costs and at least one member of the plaintiff class is a citizen of a state different from at least one defendant, then the federal court “shall have original jurisdiction” by virtue of 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(2).<sup>14</sup> This means that a class action asserting state law claims for relief that satisfies these criteria now can be originally brought in federal and, if filed in state court, can be brought into the federal system thanks to Congress’s passage of § 1453, the corresponding removal provision.<sup>15</sup>

CAFA impacts most class suits that raise state law claims, but not all of them. Obviously, any suit involving less than the $5,000,000 floor would be outside the statute’s reach. Additionally, expansive as CAFA is, there are some provisions that limit the breadth of this expansion. We will return to these in a moment. It is enough to say now that whether one characterizes the elements necessary to satisfy jurisdiction (such as the aggregate amount in controversy requirement or that of minimal diversity between the parties) differently than those elements that limit jurisdiction turns out to matter a great deal in the debate over who bears what burden of jurisdictional proof.

A. THE THRESHOLD OR PRIMA FACIE BURDEN

It is a venerable principle of federal jurisdictional law that the party seeking to maintain a suit in the federal forum (whether by virtue of instituting it himself or removing a case instituted by someone else in state court) bears the burden of proving the existence of the district court’s subject matter jurisdiction over the case.<sup>16</sup> Nevertheless, a debate emerged in the early CAFA case law as to whether Congress in the statute shifted some or all of this initial burden.<sup>17</sup> While a few district courts initially leaned in the other

---

14. Id. The section provides in full:

(2) The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action in which the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $5,000,000, exclusive of interest and costs, and is a class action in which—

(A) any member of a class of plaintiffs is a citizen of a State different from any defendant;

(B) any member of a class of plaintiffs is a foreign state or a citizen or subject of a foreign state and any defendant is a citizen of a State; or

(C) any member of a class of plaintiffs is a citizen of a State and any defendant is a foreign state or a citizen or subject of a foreign state.

Id.

15. See id. § 1453.

16. See supra note 4; see also Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env’t, 523 U.S. 83, 94–95 (1998) (“The requirement that jurisdiction be established as a threshold matter ‘spring[s] from the nature and limits of the judicial power of the United States’ and is ‘inflexible and without exception.’” (quoting Mansfield, C. & L. M. Ry. Co. v. Swan, 111 U.S. 379, 382 (1884))) (alteration in original). Because we regard federal courts as courts of limited jurisdiction, Owens Equipment & Erection Co. v. Kroger, 437 U.S. 365, 374 (1978), that means we must begin with a presumption against the existence of federal court jurisdiction. See McNutt v. Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp. of Ind., Inc., 298 U.S. 178, 189 (1936). This presumption is what produces the heavy burden that the party seeking to invoke federal jurisdiction bears. See id. at 189; Wilson v. Republic Iron & Steel Co., 257 U.S. 92, 97 (1921).

17. See, e.g., Dinkel v. Gen. Motors Corp., 400 F. Supp. 2d 289, 295 (D. Me. 2005); Berry v. Am. Express Publ’g, Corp., 381 F. Supp. 2d 1118, 1122–23 (C.D. Cal. 2005). Several lawyers prominent in CAFA debates argued that these early courts got it right and that the threshold jurisdictional burden should shift to the party opposing jurisdiction. See H. Hunter Twiford, III, Anthony Rollo & John T.

direction, the vast majority—and all of the circuit courts to consider the question—have held that the initial burden of demonstrating the existence of subject matter jurisdiction lies with the party that wants to be in federal court.<sup>18</sup> Adhering to this traditional placement of the jurisdictional burden of proof, the courts have described the principle as “near-canonical”<sup>19</sup> and a “well-settled practice in removal actions.”<sup>20</sup>

In roundly rejecting the suggestion that Congress altered this traditional placement of the burden of proof on the party seeking the federal forum, most courts have considered it critical that the statute is silent on this point.<sup>21</sup> Such silence, the courts say, is almost dispositive evidence of congressional intent.<sup>22</sup> “[I]t would be thoroughly unsound for [the] Court to reject a longstanding rule absent an explicit directive from Congress,” one court intoned.<sup>23</sup> “We presume that Congress, when it enacted CAFA, knew where the burden of proof had traditionally been placed. By its silence, we conclude that Congress chose not to alter that rule.”<sup>24</sup>

Indeed, courts also typically reject reliance on the statute’s legislative history to support the argument that Congress intended to shift the burden of proof on the threshold showing of jurisdiction to the plaintiff. In Brill v. Countrywide Home Loans, for instance, the plaintiff argued that a Senate Committee Report specifically stated that “the named plaintiff(s) should bear the burden of demonstrating that the removal was improvident.”<sup>25</sup> The Seventh Circuit refused to accept this argument, observing that “[t]his passage does not concern any text in the bill that eventually became law. When a law sensibly could be read in multiple ways, legislative history may help a court understand which of these received the political branches’ imprimatur. But when the legislative

---

Rouse, CAFA’s New “Minimal Diversity” Standard for Interstate Class Actions Creates a Presumption that Jurisdiction Exists, with the Burden of Proof Assigned to the Party Opposing Jurisdiction, 25 MISS. C. L. REV. 7, 9–10 (2005). For a discussion of all of these early cases, see generally Lonny Sheinkopf Hoffman, In Retrospect: A First Year Review of the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, 39 LOY. L.A. L. REV. 1135 (2006); and Linda S. Mullenix, CAFA Cacophony, NAT. L.J., Jan. 22, 2007, at 13.

18. See Lowery v. Ala. Power Co., 483 F.3d 1184, 1207 (11th Cir. 2007); Blockbuster, Inc. v. Galeno, 472 F.3d 53, 58 (2d Cir. 2006); Morgan v. Gay, 471 F.3d 469, 473 (3d Cir. 2006); DiTolla v. Doral Dental IPA of New York, LLC, 469 F.3d 271, 275 (2d Cir. 2006); Miedema v. Maytag Corp., 450 F.3d 1322, 1328–29 (11th Cir. 2006); Evans v. Walters Indus., Inc., 449 F.3d 1159, 1164 (11th Cir. 2006); Abrego Abrego v. Dow Chem. Co., 443 F.3d 676, 686 (9th Cir. 2006); Brill v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 427 F.3d 446, 448 (7th Cir. 2005).

19. Abrego Abrego, 443 F.3d at 684.

20. Morgan, 471 F.3d at 473.

21. See, e.g., DiTolla, 469 F.3d at 275.

22. See id.

23. Id.; see also Miedema, 450 F.3d at 1329. Relatedly, most courts interpreting the new statute have similarly found that, consistent with the interpretation of other removal provisions Congress has previously enacted, the removal portions in CAFA should be strictly construed against removal, and all doubts construed in favor of remand. See, e.g., Abrego Abrego, 443 F.3d at 685; Tiffany v. Hometown Buffet, Inc., No. C 06-2524 SBA, 2006 WL 1749557, at *4 (N.D. Cal. June 22, 2006).

24. DiTolla, 469 F.3d at 275.

25. Brill v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 427 F.3d 446, 448 (7th Cir. 2005) (citing S. REP. NO. 109-14, at 42 (2005)).

history stands by itself, as a naked expression of ‘intent’ unconnected to any enacted text, it has no more force than an opinion poll of legislators . . . .”<sup>26</sup>

It bears emphasizing that this distinction between text and legislative history untethered to text that the courts have drawn with regard to the threshold jurisdictional showing is not unique to CAFA. In this regard, the CAFA cases rejecting efforts to shift the initial burden of jurisdictional proof are straightforward applications of well-established general principles of statutory interpretation.<sup>27</sup> If it has not been surprising, then, to see that most courts have refused to find that the new statute shifts the initial jurisdictional burden of proof, that makes stranger still the story of how a second burden of proof question, with regard to other provisions in CAFA that limit the scope of the statute’s reach, has come to be addressed and answered.

B. SHIFTING THE BURDEN OF PROOF AS TO CAFA’S “EXCEPTIONS”

While CAFA greatly expands federal jurisdiction, as we have seen, it also contains provisions that simultaneously limit the breadth of this expansion. The purpose behind these parts of the statute ostensibly was to try to strike a balance between those cases that, in Congress’s judgment, warrant federal jurisdiction and those that have “a truly local focus,”<sup>28</sup> though one can and should doubt the sincerity of the effort to strike a fair equilibrium.<sup>29</sup>

Oddly named, they are even harder to categorize. Section 1332(d)(4)(A) is regularly referred to as the “local controversy” exception, a phrase that does not appear in the statute but is meant to get at the idea that if “greater than two-thirds” of the putative class and at least one defendant is a forum citizen and alleged to bear “significant” responsibility for the plaintiffs’ alleged injuries, then the case ought to be litigated in state court since it is truly a local matter.<sup>30</sup>

---

26. Id.; see also Miedema, 450 F.3d at 1328 (“While a committee report may ordinarily be used to interpret unclear language contained in a statute, a committee report cannot serve as an independent statutory source having the force of law.” (quoting United States v. Thigpen, 4 F.3d 1573, 1577 (11th Cir. 1993))); id. (commenting that “naked legislative history has no legal effect . . . . The rule that the proponent of federal jurisdiction bears the risk of non-persuasion has been around for a long time.”).

27. See, e.g., Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Allapattah Servs., Inc., 545 U.S. 546, 568 (2005) (“[J]udicial reliance on legislative materials like committee reports, which are not themselves subject to the requirements of Article I, may give unrepresentative committee members—or, worse yet, unelected staffers and lobbyists—both the power and the incentive to attempt strategic manipulations of legislative history to secure results they were unable to achieve through the statutory text.”).

28. S. REP. NO. 109-14, at 39 (2005), as reprinted in 2005 U.S.C.C.A.N. 3, 28; see also Hart v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 457 F.3d 675, 682 (7th Cir. 2006) (observing that the “local controversy” and “home state” “exceptions are designed to draw a delicate balance between making a federal forum available to genuinely national litigation and allowing the state courts to retain cases when the controversy is strongly linked to that state”).

29. Burbank, supra note 12, at 93 (“At the end of the day, CAFA’s exceedingly narrow exceptions are revealed as another depressing example of legislative arreachng by those who invoke the virtues of federalism when it is convenient.”).

30. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1332(d)(4)(A) (2006). This section provides that:

A district court shall decline to exercise jurisdiction under paragraph (2)—

A similar purpose lies behind § 1332(d)(4)(B), which also is aimed at not allowing the statute to sweep local controversies into federal court, but has been dubbed, instead and rather clumsily, the “home state” exception.<sup>31</sup> This rule filters out just slightly more cases, in the sense that it applies where “two-thirds or more” of the putative class members are from forum, a figure which apparently, but inexplicably, includes those cases where exactly 66.6% of the class members are forum citizens (as opposed to the “local controversy” provision which requires that the figure be at least .01% more).<sup>32</sup>

At the same time, a second and more significant requirement of § 1332(d)(4)(B), that “all” defendants must have been “primary” wrongdoers, seems intended to restrict the application of § 1332(d)(4)(B) as compared with § 1332(d)(4)(A). Whatever difference there is between a “primary” and “significant” wrongdoer (and several courts have concluded that Congress intended there to be one, though the practical distinction may be fairly small),<sup>33</sup> by requiring that every named defendant be a “primary” defendant, this statutory condition plainly is intended to more severely restrict the provision’s applicability.<sup>34</sup>

Still other parts of CAFA exclude from federal jurisdiction other kinds of cases, such as those where the defendant is a state, state official, or other governmental entity,<sup>35</sup> those that involve certain securities claims,<sup>36</sup> and

-
- (A)(i) over a class action in which—
 (I) greater than two-thirds of the members of all proposed plaintiff classes in the aggregate are citizens of the State in which the action was originally filed;
 (II) at least 1 defendant is a defendant—
 (aa) from whom significant relief is sought by members of the plaintiff class;
 (bb) whose alleged conduct forms a significant basis for the claims asserted by the proposed plaintiff class; and
 (cc) who is a citizen of the State in which the action was originally filed; and
 (III) principal injuries resulting from the alleged conduct or any related conduct of each defendant were incurred in the State in which the action was originally filed; and
 (ii) during the 3-year period preceding the filing of that class action, no other class action has been filed asserting the same or similar factual allegations against any of the defendants on behalf of the same or other persons.

Id.

31. Id. § 1332(d)(4)(B). Under this section, a district court shall decline to exercise jurisdiction under paragraph (2) over a class action in which “(B) two-thirds or more of the members of all proposed plaintiff classes in the aggregate, and the primary defendants, are citizens of the State in which the action was originally filed.” Id.

32. See id.

33. See, e.g., Caruso v. Allstate Ins. Co., 469 F. Supp. 2d 364, 369 (E.D. La. 2007).

34. See 28 U.S.C.A. § 1332(d)(4)(B).

35. Section 1332(d)(5) provides that “[p]aragraphs (2) through (4) shall not apply to any class action in which—(A) the primary defendants are States, State officials, or other governmental entities against whom the district court may be foreclosed from ordering relief.” Id. § 1332(d)(5).

36. Id. §§ 1332(d)(9)(A), (C). Section 1332(d)(9) provides, in full:

- (9) Paragraph (2) shall not apply to any class action that solely involves a claim—
 (A) concerning a covered security as defined under 16(f)(3) of the Securities Act of 1933 (15 U.S.C. 78p(f)(3)) and section 28(f)(5)(E) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78bb(f)(5)(E));
 (B) that relates to the internal affairs or governance of a corporation or other form of business enterprise and that arises under or by virtue of the laws of the State in which such corporation or business enterprise is incorporated or organized; or those cases raising state claims regarding the internal affairs or governance of a company or other business entity.<sup>37</sup>

In addition to and unlike all of these mandatory exclusions from jurisdiction, one other provision in CAFA gives district judges discretion to decide whether to keep a case over which CAFA has extended jurisdiction.<sup>38</sup> The “interests of justice” exception, as it has been called by others, is found in § 1332(d)(3), and covers cases where between one-third and two-thirds of the proposed class members and the primary defendants are forum citizens.<sup>39</sup>

How are all of these provisions in CAFA to be characterized? We have seen already that they are described by most commentators and courts as “exceptions” to jurisdiction, as in the “local controversy exception,” “home state exception,” “state action exception,” and so forth.<sup>40</sup> Far and away, this is the predominant way the provisions have been understood, even though none of these terms appear in any of the provisions.<sup>41</sup> Nevertheless, they have come to be characterized by nearly all courts to consider them as “exceptions” to the expanded grant of jurisdiction in CAFA; specifically, that is, as exceptions to the expanded grant of jurisdiction in § 1332(d)(2).

Calling them “exceptions,” those who hold to this view are distinguishing between jurisdiction-granting and jurisdiction-limiting rules. The notion goes something like this: If the elements that confer jurisdiction are satisfied, then the court has jurisdiction. Jurisdiction can be taken away by other provisions, but—and this seems to be the important point—adherents of this view are certain that, at least in some theoretical sense, jurisdiction once conferred did exist, even if only for a fleeting moment.<sup>42</sup> It can be undone, but its initial existence cannot be denied.

The notion that one can divine legislative intent by somehow distinguishing certain provisions as “exceptions” immediately raises a number of

---

(C) that relates to the rights, duties (including fiduciary duties), and obligations relating to or created by or pursuant to any security (as defined under section 2(a)(1) of the Securities Act of 1933 (15 U.S.C. 77b(a)(1)) and the regulations issued thereunder).

Id. § 1332(d)(9).

37. Id. § 1332(d)(9)(B).

38. Id. § 1332(d)(3) (2006).

39. Id.

40. See Hart v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 457 F.3d 675, 676 (7th Cir. 2006).

41. For the leading circuit court cases, to date, see Preston v. Tenet Healthsystem Memorial Medical Center, Inc., 485 F.3d 793 (5th Cir. 2007); Serrano v. 180 Connect, Inc., 478 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 2007); Hart v. Fedex Ground Package Systems, Inc., 457 F.3d 675 (7th Cir. 2006); Frazier v. Pioneer Americas, LLC, 455 F.3d 542 (5th Cir. 2006); Evans v. Walter Industries, Inc., 449 F.3d 1159 (11th Cir. 2006). There have been very few dissenters. See Lao v. Wickes Furniture Co., 455 F. Supp. 2d 1045 (C.D. Cal. 2006), overruled by Serrano v. 180 Connect, Inc., 478 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 2007); Serrano v. 180 Connect, Inc., No. C 06-1363 TEH, 2006 WL 2348888 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 11, 2006), rev'd, 478 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 2007); Kearns v. Ford Motor Co., No. CV 05-5644 GAF(JTLX), 2005 WL 3967998 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 21, 2005), overruled by Serrano v. 180 Connect, Inc., 478 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 2007).

42. See Serrano, 478 F.3d at 1022 (“Implicit in both subsections (d)(3) and (d)(4) is that the court has jurisdiction, but the court either may or must decline to exercise such jurisdiction.”); Lao, 455 F. Supp. 2d at 1057 (citing Opp. Brief of Defs., at 10 n. 7) (“Merely declining to exercise subject matter jurisdiction . . . presumes that subject matter jurisdiction exists to begin with. How else could a court decline to do something unless there were in fact something—in this case jurisdiction—to decline?”).

perplexing questions. For one thing, what textual proof is there that these provisions are “exceptions” to jurisdiction in the sense that they are distinct from an a priori grant of jurisdiction elsewhere in the statute? Further, even if there is a plausible textual basis for distinguishing jurisdictional grants from exceptions in the statute, why do the courts assume that all such exceptions to jurisdiction in CAFA necessarily have to be proven by the party who is arguing for their applicability? Outside of the specific CAFA context, the courts routinely require the party who desires to litigate in the federal forum to bear the burden of proof as to other, more familiar statutory provisions that limit removal rights.<sup>43</sup> Most of all, how can we explain the startling level of agreement among courts in interpreting a statute that, on the specific issue of the burden of jurisdictional proof, is conspicuously silent and, from a broader perspective, has been characterized as “clumsy,”<sup>44</sup> “bewildering,”<sup>45</sup> and “a headache to construe.”<sup>46</sup> To get at the answers to these questions, it is necessary to take a much closer look at the leading cases and the arguments they have credited to justify this shift in the jurisdictional burden.

II. BEHIND THE CASES

A. THE ASSUMPTION THAT THE PLAINTIFF IS IN A BETTER POSITION TO ACCESS THE JURISDICTIONAL FACTS

To justify shifting the burden of proof in §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) some courts have given credence to the argument that the plaintiff is in the better position to access the facts supporting the existence or nonexistence of jurisdiction.<sup>47</sup> Both the Eleventh Circuit in Evans and the Fifth Circuit in Frazier concluded that Congress intended to shift the burden of jurisdictional proof as to these statutory subsections, in part, because they were convinced that plaintiffs generally have better access to facts relevant to the jurisdictional analysis called for by §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4).<sup>48</sup> “[P]lacing the burden of proof on the plaintiff in this situation,” the Evans court intoned, “places the burden on the party most capable of bearing it.”<sup>49</sup> The Fifth Circuit followed in stride.<sup>50</sup>

Oddly, both circuit court opinions talk in terms of plaintiffs, rather than the party who has invoked these subsections to try to get out of federal court.<sup>51</sup> What the courts presumably mean by this is that since questions

---

43. See supra text accompanying notes 4, 16–20.

44. Abrego Abrego v. Dow Chem. Co., 443 F.3d 676, 681 (9th Cir. 2006).

45. Id. at 686.

46. Lao, 455 F. Supp. 2d at 1048.

47. See Evans v. Walters Indus., Inc., 449 F.3d 1159, 1164 n.3 (11th Cir. 2006).

48. Frazier v. Pioneer Ams. LLC, 455 F.3d 542, 546 (5th Cir. 2006); Evans, 449 F.3d at 1164.

49. Id.

50. See Frazier, 455 F.3d at 546.

51. See id.; Evans, 449 F.3d at 1164.

regarding §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) arise most often in the context of motions to remand, the plaintiff will normally be the party who bears the burden of jurisdictional proof.<sup>52</sup> One charitably assumes that if a case were initiated in federal court and it was the defendant who was seeking dismissal, the Eleventh and Fifth Circuits would consistently leave the burden on the party who seeks to invoke §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4).<sup>53</sup>

In any event, what can be said of the empirical assertion made by these courts that the plaintiff is in a better position to gather these facts? It is possible, of course, that the plaintiff sometimes will be in a better position to know particular jurisdictional facts, relative to the defendant, like the citizenship of members of the proposed class or the amount of each of the claims being sought. But it also seems pretty hard to believe that the plaintiff will always have better access to the relevant facts. Surely there be will occasions—there were many in my own practice experience, primarily as a defense lawyer—when the defendant has a better vantage point. Indeed, it is hardly uncommon for the facts relevant to a claim to be more or exclusively in the defendant's knowledge;<sup>54</sup> it is not obvious why this would be different for jurisdictional facts. Notably, even some courts that have ultimately shifted the burden of proof onto the party seeking to dismiss or remand the case from federal court have refused to go along with the Eleventh and Fifth Circuit's reasoning, rejecting the notion that one party necessarily and always has better access to jurisdictional facts.<sup>55</sup>

---

52. The Appendix illustrates this point. Of the thirty cases where a statutory "exception" to CAFA was asserted to be applicable, all but one began in state court and then were removed to federal court by the defendant under CAFA. See Appendix A. The one exception—Mattera v. Clear Channel Communications, Inc., 239 F.R.D. 70 (S.D.N.Y. 2006)—is discussed in the following note.

53. In Mattera, the court rejected the suggestion that that the plaintiff should carry the jurisdictional burden of proof as to one of the carve-out sections where the plaintiff had filed suit initially in federal court and the defendant argued for dismissal. The court observed:

I am not convinced that a plaintiff who files an action in federal court asserting CAFA jurisdiction must not only make a prima facie showing of jurisdiction under the statute, but should also negate the applicability of the statutory exceptions. It seems contrary to CAFA's stated purpose of expanding federal court jurisdiction over class actions to allocate to the plaintiff the burden of proving that a CAFA exception does not apply, where the plaintiff, having demonstrated minimal diversity and the requisite class size and amount in controversy under CAFA, has already established a basis for federal jurisdiction. . . .

Congress, through enactment of CAFA, sought to encourage federal jurisdiction over interstate class actions. I conclude that placing the burden of establishing the applicability of a CAFA exception on the party challenging federal jurisdiction, rather than on the party invoking federal jurisdiction at the outset, better protects against the risk of state courts adjudicating class actions with national ramifications. This is precisely the harm that Congress sought to alleviate in enacting the statute. Accordingly, the Court holds that the party seeking to avail itself of an exception to CAFA jurisdiction over a case originally filed in federal court bears the burden of proving the exception applies. Here, Defendants shoulder the burden.

Mattera, 239 F.R.D. at 79.

54. See generally Lonny Sheinkopf Hoffman, Access to Information, Access to Justice: The Role of Presuit Investigatory Discovery, 40 UNIV. MICH. J.L. REFORM 217, 220–21 (2007) (discussing asymmetries of information in civil litigation).

55. Serrano v. 180 Connect, Inc., 478 F.3d 1018, 1024 n.8 (9th Cir. 2007); Hart v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 457 F.3d 675, 680 (7th Cir. 2006).

A greater difficulty with using the assumption that the plaintiff is in the better position to know the jurisdictional facts as a basis for shifting the burden of proof is that the assumption proves too much. If true, then in non-class litigation the plaintiff would again presumably be in a better position to know the relevant jurisdictional facts. Yet, we do not shift the burden of proof to the plaintiff when a defendant removes a civil action under the general removal statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1441. That is a policy judgment that, whether good or bad, does not come into play when the court is applying the directive in the general removal statute where Congress said nothing about occasions when the burden of proof should be redistributed. Indeed, this inconsistency is even present in judicial treatment of CAFA removals. Even those that would shift the burden of proof as to §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) onto the plaintiff do not do so as to the initial prima facie burden, even when the same superior knowledge may bear relevance in both places.<sup>56</sup> That powerfully suggests a fatal flaw in the logic of using this policy rationale as a substitute for express statutory authority to shift the burden.

B. OF LEGISLATIVE HISTORY AND LEGISLATIVE SPIRIT

A second justification some have offered for shifting the burden is that the legislative history asserts that this was Congress's intent.<sup>57</sup> Relatedly, some courts and prominent commentators have made reference to CAFA's initial "Findings and Purposes" as further evidence Congress intended to shift the burden of proof.<sup>58</sup> The latter regards the opening "Findings and Purposes" in the statute, which detail a litany of perceived class action abuses and absurdities, as reflective of the spirit in which Congress passed this reform legislation.<sup>59</sup> According to this view, any interpretative questions regarding the statute should be read to favor the most expansive reading because Congress must have wanted to sweep into the net as many abusive class action cases as possible.<sup>60</sup>

---

56. See, e.g., Evans, 449 F.3d at 1164.

57. See, e.g., Hart, 457 F.3d at 681 (finding support for its textual reading of statute in legislative history, observing that "it is also worth noting that this outcome is consistent with the legislative history of CAFA. The Senate Judiciary Committee unambiguously signaled where it believed the burden should lie."); see also Frazier v. Pioneer Ams. LLC, 455 F.3d 542, 545 n.5 (5th Cir. 2006); Evans, 449 F.3d at 1163.

58. Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-2, § 2, 119 Stat. 4, 4-5 (codified at 28 U.S.C.A. § 1711 (2006)); see, e.g., Hart, 457 F.3d at 681-82 ("Our holding that the plaintiff has the burden of persuasion on the question whether the home-state or local controversy exceptions apply is also consistent with the stated purposes of the statute. . . . These exceptions are designed to draw a delicate balance between making a federal forum available to genuinely national litigation and allowing the state courts to retain cases when the controversy is strongly linked to that state."); Twiford, Rollo & Rouse, supra note 16, at 9 (arguing that "Congress's 'Findings and Purposes' expressly reflect a goal of changing the jurisdictional status quo for class actions" even as to the threshold jurisdictional burden under subsection (d)(2) of the Act).

59. See, e.g., Hart, 457 F.3d at 681-82 ("Our holding that the plaintiff has the burden of persuasion on the question whether the home-state or local controversy exceptions apply is also consistent with the stated purposes of the statute. Congress made the following findings when it enacted CAFA . . .").

60. Cf. McMorris v. TJX Companies, Inc., 493 F. Supp. 2d 158, 166 (D. Mass. 2007) ("Whatever

In practice, this nod to spirit means that even if the statute does not seem to directly speak to the particular question at issue—how do we precisely determine when a case has been “commenced” for statutory applicability purposes?<sup>61</sup> Is a federal court still bound by Klaxon Co. v. Stentor Electric Manufacturing Co.<sup>62</sup> to follow state choice of law rules or does the statute free its hand? Who bears what burden of jurisdictional proof?—the answer invariably lies in an awareness of the spirit of the statute. Congress, we are assured, would have wanted us to read the statute in such a way as to best ensure that it is applied as expansively as possible.<sup>63</sup> After all, Congress expanded federal jurisdiction precisely to remedy these perceived abuses.<sup>64</sup> What further or better proof of legislative intent is needed?

This is the kind of argument that is as unplagued by doubt as it is unbounded in scope. Outside of the class action context, the Supreme Court has recently and powerfully denounced the view that whatever advances a statute’s purposes must influence judicial interpretation of ambiguous statutory terms.<sup>65</sup> I will not spend any more time on it other than to make reference to two excellent commentaries, one by Steve Burbank and another by Douglas Floyd, that expose as absurd the notion of looking to CAFA’s “Findings and Purposes” as a reliable tool of statutory construction.<sup>66</sup>

As for the statute’s legislative history, it is notable that in wrestling with the problem of jurisdictional proof under §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) most courts have not been deterred by inconsistency.<sup>67</sup> Where legislative history has been regarded as “entitled to exceptionally little weight” on other CAFA interpretative questions,<sup>68</sup> as we saw earlier, not so with the burden shifting arguments advanced as to §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4). Most astonishingly, courts that have refused to look to the statute’s legislative history as proof the actual social benefits of class action litigation, however, CAFA is generally regarded as reflecting skepticism about the work of plaintiffs’ class action attorneys.”).

---

61. See generally Lonny Sheinkopf Hoffman, The “Commencement” Problem: Lessons From A Statute’s First Year, 40 U.C. DAVIS. L. REV. 469 (2006) (discussing the commencement date of cases).

62. 313 U.S. 487 (1941); see Patrick Woolley, Erie and Choice of Law After the Class Action Fairness Act, 80 TUL. L. REV. 1723, 1747, 1747–57 (2006) (discussing the Klaxon question by admirably treating CAFA’s “Findings and Purposes” in a more sophisticated manner and considering the choice of law effect of the congressional finding in CAFA that in certifying nationwide classes state courts had been “making judgments that impose their view of the law on other States and bind the rights of the residents of those States” (quoting Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-2, 119 Stat. 4 (codified at 28 U.S.C. 1711))).

63. See supra notes 57–60 and accompanying text.

64. See supra notes 57–60 and accompanying text.

65. Norfolk S. Ry. Co. v. Sorrell, 127 S. Ct. 799, 808 (2007) (quoting Rodriguez v. United States, 480 U.S. 522, 526 (1987) (per curiam) and its observation that “it frustrates rather than effectuates legislative intent simplistically to assume that whatever furthers the statute’s primarily objective must be the law”) (emphasis in original).

66. Stephen B. Burbank, Aggregation on the Couch: The Strategic Uses of Ambiguity and Hypocrisy, 106 COLUM. L. REV. 1924 (2006); C. Douglas Floyd, The Inadequacy of the Interstate Commerce Justification for the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, 55 EMORY L.J. 487, 507–20 (2006).

67. See infra notes 68–72 and accompanying text.

68. Abrego Abrego v. Dow Chem. Co., 443 F.3d 676, 687 (9th Cir. 2006); see also Frazier v. Pioneer Ams. LLC, 455 F.3d 542, 545 n.5 (5th Cir. 2006) (citing to legislative history and observing that “[t]he relevant statements show an intent to burden plaintiffs both as to prima facie jurisdiction, and as to the exceptions”) (citations omitted).

Congress intended to shift the initial prima facie burden of jurisdictional proof, have been willing to do so as to the “exceptions.”<sup>69</sup> We previously saw that the Seventh Circuit in Brill refused to look to the same Senate Committee Report in deciding the question of Congress’s intent with regard to prima facie jurisdictional burden, calling it “a naked expression of ‘intent’ unconnected to any enacted text.”<sup>70</sup> The complete quote, even more damning, makes it all the more startling that another panel of the Seventh Circuit was willing to give any credence to this same legislative history in assessing congressional intent as to the discretionary and mandatory carve-out sections in §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4).

[W]hen the legislative history stands by itself, as a naked expression of “intent” unconnected to any enacted text, it has no more force than an opinion poll of legislators—less, really, as it speaks for fewer. Thirteen Senators signed this report and five voted not to send the proposal to the floor. Another 82 Senators did not express themselves on the question; likewise 435 Members of the House and one President kept their silence . . . . [N]aked legislative history has no legal effect . . . . The rule that the proponent of federal jurisdiction bears the risk of non-persuasion has been around for a long time. To change such a rule, Congress must enact a statute with the President’s signature (or by a two-thirds majority to override a veto). A declaration by 13 Senators will not serve.<sup>71</sup>

In short, courts are not supposed to look to legislative history to provide the justification for reading into a statute that which the legislators did not write into it.<sup>72</sup>

And we can not square the difference by pointing to some judgment that the language in §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) is more ambiguous than in § 1332(d)(2). The courts are not saying that. Reliance on legislative history is so dubious in this context that even some of those who would shift the burden of proof decline to do so on the basis of looking to the statute’s legislative history.<sup>73</sup>

Another weakness in looking to legislative history to justify a burden shifting conclusion is that the evidence does not point in one direction.

---

69. See Hart v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 457 F.3d 675, 679–81 (7th Cir. 2006).

70. Brill v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 427 F.3d 446, 448 (7th Cir. 2005).

71. Id.

72. See supra note 26; see also United States v. Am. Coll. of Physicians, 475 U.S. 834, 846–47 (1986) (observing that while the legislative history seemed to endorse a per se rule, “we are hesitant to rely on that inconclusive legislative history either to supply a provision not enacted by Congress . . . or to define a statutory term enacted by a prior Congress”).

73. See, e.g., Serrano v. 180 Connect, Inc., 478 F.3d 1018, 1024 (9th Cir. 2007) (finding that the text suggested a congressional intent to shift the burden of jurisdictional proof but commenting that “[a]s we observed in Abrego, we do not think that Congressional silence on the burden of proof results in ambiguity in the statute, and thus we do not rely on the legislative history as the basis for our holding”) (citation omitted).

Other parts of the legislative history can be read to show that §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) were meant to be part of the jurisdictional prima facie case, as the district court in Lao v. Wickes Furniture Co., Inc. discovered:

The bill grants the federal courts original jurisdiction to hear interstate class action cases . . . . The bill, however, includes several provisions ensuring that where appropriate, state courts can adjudicate certain class actions that have a truly local focus. The first is the “Home State” exception. Under this provision, if two-thirds or more of the class members are from the defendant's home state, the case would not be subject to federal jurisdiction. . . . In addition, S. 5 contains a “Local Controversy Exception” . . . [and] [i]f all of [its] four criteria are satisfied, the case will not be subject to federal jurisdiction under the bill.<sup>74</sup>

Legislative history can be like a siren song that can easily steer us into trouble. In Lowery v. Alabama Power Co., in dealing with a different but related interpretative question under CAFA, the Eleventh Circuit was completely enthralled by these sweet sounds:

Though we are mindful that it is error to cloud the plain meaning of a statutory provision with contrary legislative history, where, as here, the legislative history comports with the interpretation that has been adopted, and where there is a potential that others may find ambiguity where we have found plain meaning, caution and completeness counsel that we discuss the statute's legislative history.<sup>75</sup>

In other words, look to legislative history when it supports the conclusion to which you are already leaning but ignore it if it seems contradictory, tautological, this argument also ignores the Court's decision in Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Allapattah Servs., where the majority read the statute to unambiguously evidence a congressional intent that was one hundred and eighty degrees different than what much of the legislative history suggested.<sup>76</sup> So much for legislative history as dispositive proof of congressional intent to shift the jurisdictional burden of proof.

C. The Resuscitation of Breuer v. Jim's Concrete of Brevard, Inc.

While there has been limited support for basing a shift in the burden of proof either on the policy rationale of the plaintiff's position or on the stat-

---

74. 455 F. Supp. 2d 1045, 1058–59 (C.D. Cal. 2006) (quoting S. REP. NO. 109-14, at 28 (2005)).

75. Lowery v. Ala. Power Co., 483 F.3d 1184, 1205 (11th Cir. 2007).

76. Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Allapattah Servs., Inc., 545 U.S. 546, 567 (2005) (“The proponents of the alternative view of § 1367 insist that the statute is at least ambiguous and that we should look to other interpretive tools, including the legislative history of § 1367, which supposedly demonstrate Congress did not intend § 1367 to overrule Zahn.”).

ute's legislative history and/or its spirit, all the courts that have shifted the burden of proof as to §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) have felt bound to do so by the Supreme Court's decision in Breuer v. Jim's Concrete of Brevard, Inc.<sup>77</sup> Typical is the Eleventh Circuit's assessment:

[W]hen a party seeks to avail itself of an express statutory exception to federal jurisdiction granted under CAFA, as in this case, we hold that the party seeking remand bears the burden of proof with regard to that exception. Cf. Breuer v. Jim's Concrete of Brevard, Inc., (holding that when a defendant removes a case under 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a), the burden is on a plaintiff to find an express exception to removal).<sup>78</sup>

Indeed, whether to characterize these jurisdiction-limiting provisions as "exceptions" turns out to have mattered even to the few courts that have ultimately concluded that Congress did not intend to shift any jurisdictional burden of proof.<sup>79</sup> This is because all courts seem to regard Breuer as directly on point. Thus, in Lao v. Wickes Furniture Co., Inc., even though the court ultimately did not shift the burden of proof, it nevertheless observed that

Defendants argue that this statutory language and structure makes clear that (d)(4)'s provisions are more akin to statutory exceptions to removal than part of (d)(2)'s jurisdictional criteria. This characterization is important because, at the time of CAFA's passage, the Supreme Court in Breuer v. Jim's Concrete of Brevard, Inc. had recognized that the opponent of removal under 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a) must prove that there is an express exception to removability. In essence, defendants argue that "the relation between subparts (d)(2) and (d)(4) of CAFA is analogous to the structure of 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a)." If defendants' analogy to section 1441(a) holds, it would weigh heavily in this Court's analysis as upon whom the burden of persuasion lies in this case.<sup>80</sup>

The key line being referenced from Breuer, cited over and over again by CAFA courts, is this one: "Since 1948, therefore, there has been no question that whenever the subject matter of an action qualifies it for removal, the burden is on a plaintiff to find an express exception."<sup>81</sup> The lower courts read this passage from Breuer to mean that because §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) are "exceptions" to jurisdiction it is appropriate to

---

77. 538 U.S. 691 (2003).

78. Evans v. Walters Indus., Inc., 449 F.3d 1159, 1164 (11th Cir. 2006) (citations omitted).

79. Lao, 455 F. Supp. 2d at 1056–57.

80. Id. at 1054 (citations omitted).

81. 538 U.S. at 698.

shift the burden of proof to the plaintiff to demonstrate their applicability.<sup>82</sup> In this manner, the courts have felt unconstrained by the “near canonical” principle, described above, that the party seeking the federal forum bears the burden of jurisdictional proof.<sup>83</sup>

Citation to Breuer by courts in 2006 in the CAFA cases is more than a little remarkable. The case was a rather dubious addition to the Court’s docket in the 2002 term.<sup>84</sup> The Breuer issue concerned the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.<sup>85</sup> That statute provides—as many other statutes similarly do—that “[a]n action to recover [under the statute] may be maintained . . . in any Federal or State court of competent jurisdiction.”<sup>86</sup> Taking advantage of the grant of concurrent jurisdiction, the plaintiff decided to file suit in state court.<sup>87</sup> The defendant promptly removed the case to federal court as a case coming within the court’s federal question jurisdiction.<sup>88</sup> The plaintiffs then moved to remand, advancing the most improbable of arguments: that by giving plaintiffs the right to bring a suit in either state or federal court, the Congress was expressly taking away the defendant’s right to remove the case once it had been properly filed in the state court.<sup>89</sup>

As remarkable as this sounds, the plaintiff actually found one old Eighth Circuit case that supported its argument—a really old case, decided before Congress revised the removal statute in 1948.<sup>90</sup> Every other court that had been presented with this argument had rejected it. But a circuit split is a circuit split, I guess, and the Court decided to take the case.<sup>91</sup>

Oral argument proved to be more of the same, with the justices puzzling out loud the merits (or lack thereof) of petitioner’s position.<sup>92</sup> When the Court issued its unanimous opinion affirming the judgment below, it was anything but surprising. The language in the FLSA, the Court concluded, does not amount to an express exception to removal.<sup>93</sup> That should have

---

82. See, e.g., Hart v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 457 F.3d 675, 681 (7th Cir. 2006) (shifting burden to plaintiff).

83. See supra text accompanying notes 16–20.

84. As a personal aside, I first learned that the Court had granted certiorari in Breuer in the fall of 2002 while preparing to teach a first year civil procedure class on subject matter jurisdiction. I distinctly remember thinking at the time that it was rather surprising the Court had taken the case, since the issue it posed hardly seemed to merit the Court’s limited resources.

85. Breuer, 538 U.S. at 693.

86. 29 U.S.C. § 216(b) (2000).

87. See Breuer, 538 U.S. at 693.

88. Id. at 693–94.

89. Id. at 694.

90. Johnson v. Butler Bros., 162 F.2d 87, 88–90 (8th Cir. 1947).

91. I ended up getting involved in Breuer because of my recent, prior involvement in another case before the Court that also dealt with removal issues. That case was Syngenta Crop Protection, Inc. v. Henson, 537 U.S. 28 (2002). For a discussion of the case, see Lonny Sheinkopf Hoffman, Syngenta, Stephenson and the Federal Judicial Injunctive Power, 37 AKRON L. REV. 605 (2004). The only thing I really did in Breuer was review a draft of the respondent’s brief and make some modest suggestions which, in the event, seemed largely unnecessary since the legal arguments already appeared so lopsided.

92. Transcript of Oral Argument, Breuer, 538 U.S. 691 (No. 02-337).

93. Breuer, 538 U.S. at 697 (“When Congress has ‘wished to give plaintiffs an absolute choice of forum, it has shown itself capable of doing so in unmistakable terms.’ It has not done so here.”) (citation omitted).

been the end of Breuer but four years later, the case has been disinterred and now is being cited as one of the key arguments in a technical but critically important question under CAFA. But does Breuer really stand for the proposition that its new CAFA proponents insist upon?

Despite the confidence with which the courts have read Breuer as directly on point in terms of the CAFA, I doubt seriously that the Supreme Court will find the case has any applicability in this context. Breuer essentially is a case that asks whether Congress had done something it rarely does. That is, did Congress in the FLSA grant concurrent jurisdiction to state and federal courts but withhold the defendant's right to remove such a case if the plaintiff chose to file it in state court, a right that would otherwise automatically exist by virtue of § 1441?<sup>94</sup> This is the legislative prerogative, but it has been exercised infrequently.<sup>95</sup>

All the Court meant in Breuer when it said "there has been no question that whenever the subject matter of an action qualifies it for removal, the burden is on a plaintiff to find an express exception"<sup>96</sup> was that the burden ought to be on the party who is trying to show this is one of those rare instances when Congress established a grant of original jurisdiction without a corresponding removal right. In the absence of some express exception to removal—"except as otherwise expressly provided by Act of Congress," as § 1441 provides—the defendant always has the right to remove a case from state court that is within a grant of original jurisdiction to the district court.<sup>97</sup> The Court in Breuer was simply saying that as a matter of statutory interpretation it makes sense to read the opening phrase of § 1441 as placing the burden on the plaintiff to show that this is one of those rare occasions where Congress intended to make the federal forum available to a plaintiff but to respect her choice to bring suit in state court.

Breuer also should not be read to suggest that all exceptions to removal must be proven by the plaintiff because this proposition is inconsistent with longstanding judicial practice as to removal exceptions that are far more commonplace and familiar. Consider, for instance, 28 U.S.C. § 1441(b), the second sentence of which withholds in diversity cases a defendant's right to remove that would otherwise exist under § 1441(a) when at least one named defendant is a citizen of the state in which the action was filed. Though a limitation or "exception," if you will, to the general removal right in § 1441(a), the courts routinely place the burden on the defendant to prove that removal was not proscribed by § 1441(b).<sup>98</sup>

---

94. See id. at 694 ("Removal of FLSA actions is thus prohibited under § 1441(a) only if Congress expressly provided as much.")

95. See id. at 696–97 (detailing the handful of statutes where an express limitation on removal has been set forth).

96. Id. at 698.

97. 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a) (2000).

98. For example, in Hogge v. A W Chesterton Co., No. C07-02873 MJJ, 2007 WL 1674088, at *1 (N.D. Cal. Jun. 8, 2007), the court observed that § 1441(b) "further provides that if the basis for federal jurisdiction is diversity of citizenship, removal is available only if no defendant is a citizen of the forum

Similarly, § 1446(b) requires that the notice of removal be filed within thirty days after the defendant receives notice of a pleading that shows the case is removable.<sup>99</sup> There is an exception that courts recognize, referred to as the “revival exception,” which in one form provides that “a lapsed right to remove an initially removable case within thirty days is restored when the complaint is amended so substantially as to alter the character of the action and constitute essentially a new lawsuit.”<sup>100</sup> As with § 1441(b)’s forum defendant exception, the defendant always bears the burden of proving this revival exception applicable.<sup>101</sup> The underlying rationale is the same as with § 1441(b): The party removing a case to federal court is obliged to demonstrate that the case was properly removed and the court has jurisdiction over it.<sup>102</sup>

Once we correctly understand Breuer, it is easy to distinguish this circumstance from CAFA. With CAFA, the question is not whether Congress has withheld any right to remove; we know, instead, that it has expressly granted a removal right in § 1453.<sup>103</sup> Nor is there any doubt that Congress has limited jurisdiction in cases where either § 1332(d)(3) or either of the provisions in § 1332(d)(4) apply. The only question is who has the burden of proof to show that the elements of these provisions have or have not been satisfied. As to this critical question, Breuer has no relevance.

---

state. As the party seeking to remove the action, the defendant bears the burden of establishing that subject matter jurisdiction exists. Because the Court strictly construes the removal statute against removal, if there is any doubt as to the existence of federal jurisdiction, the Court should remand the matter to state court.” Id. (citations omitted). The court then held that “[b]ecause the record before the Court does not establish that binding settlement agreements have eliminated all non-diverse Defendants from the state court action, complete diversity did not exist as of the time of removal. Accordingly, this Court is without subject matter jurisdiction.” Id.

99. 28 U.S.C. § 1446(b).

100. Johnson v. Heublein, Inc., 227 F.3d 236, 241 (5th Cir. 2000).

101. See, e.g., City of Kenner v. United Fire & Cas. Co., No. 07-2678, 2007 WL 2177781, at *1–2 (E.D. La. July 30, 2007) (observing that “[a]s the removing party, the defendant bears the burden of establishing that federal jurisdiction exists at the time of removal” and that where the case was not initially removed within thirty days of filing and the only issue was whether the lapsed right to remove was restored when the plaintiff amended the state court petition, the court remanded the suit, finding that the defendant had failed to demonstrate that the amendments to the original petition altered the character of the action); Doe v. Fla. Int’l Univ. Bd. of Trs., 464 F. Supp. 2d 1259, 1261–62 (S.D. Fla. 2006) (remanding suit where the defendant had failed to show enough difference between the original and amended complaint to justify application of the revival exception as to the thirty day limitation on removal in § 1446(b)).

102. Relatedly, if the defendant removes a case on the ground that the plaintiff fraudulently joined a non-diverse party solely for the purpose of destroying complete diversity, the removing party bears the burden of jurisdictional proof as to the fraudulent joinder, which is to say that the defendant bears the burden of proving that some exception exists to the rule that otherwise precludes him from removing the case to federal court because there is not complete diversity between the parties. See, e.g., Jernigan v. Ashland Oil Inc., 989 F.2d 812, 815 (5th Cir. 1993). As to federal question cases and the artful pleading doctrine, the same approach is taken. It is the party desiring to gain the federal forum who must prove her right to remove and the court’s subject matter jurisdiction by showing that artful pleading has taken place. See, e.g., Green v. Ameritrade, Inc., 279 F.3d 590, 596–99 (8th Cir. 2002).

103. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1453 (2006).

D. ANALOGIZING CAFA'S PROVISIONS

Some adherents of the “exceptions” school also liken their conception of the words Congress chose in promulgating §§ 1332(d)(3) and in (d)(4) to doctrines that similarly give judicial discretion to let go of a case, like abstention doctrines.<sup>104</sup> The idea here is that abstention assumes there is subject matter jurisdiction, but the court declines to exercise its jurisdiction for some reason.<sup>105</sup> This, at least, is the traditional understanding of abstention doctrines.<sup>106</sup> Another, and better, reference for their purposes is 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c) since both are legislative pronouncements, though no courts have thought to make the reference.

Any attempted analogy between the language in CAFA and either common law abstention doctrines or the supplemental jurisdiction statute makes sense, if at all, only with regard to the discretionary language in § 1332(d)(3). That is, § 1332(d)(3) gives the court discretion to keep or decline jurisdiction in certain kinds of cases, just as these other parts of the law sometimes give a court the same power to let go of a state law claim that is appended to a federal claim within the court’s § 1331 jurisdiction.<sup>107</sup> If § 1332(d)(3) were the only limitation of jurisdiction in CAFA, we would perhaps be able to say with more confidence that it was meant to be treated as we treat abstention doctrines which give the court discretion to decline to exercise jurisdiction otherwise and previously given. But § 1332(d)(3) is not the only provision that limits jurisdiction, as we have seen. Indeed, it is the only such provision of its kind, outnumbered by the mandatory exclusions from jurisdiction in §§ 1332(d)(4)(A), (d)(4)(B), (d)(5), (d)(9)(A), (d)(9)(B), and (d)(9)(C). The conceptual framework of likening CAFA’s jurisdiction limiting provisions to abstention doctrine falls apart, then, beside the mandatory language in these other sections, all of which give the court precisely no discretion when they apply. That’s why the Lao court recoiled at the attempted analogy of § 1332(d)(4)(A) and d(4)(B) to common law abstention doctrine, observing that “no other creature like it [exists] in the law.”<sup>108</sup>

---

104. See Anthony Rollo, Hunter Twiford & Gabriel Crowson, Practitioners Review “Abstention” Procedure Under Sections 1332(d)(3) and (4), CONSUMER FIN. SERVICES L. REP., June 15, 2005, at 3.

105. See, e.g., Roche v. Country Mut. Ins. Co., No. 07-367-GPM, 2007 WL 2003092, at *6 (S.D. Ill. July 6, 2007) (observing that the “local controversy” and “home-state exception . . . provide for abstention, which means that they presuppose the existence of subject matter jurisdiction”). For a good discussion of this case law, see generally Rollo et al., supra note 104, at 3.

106. See England v. La. State Bd. of Med. Exam’rs, 375 U.S. 411, 415–16 (1964) (observing that abstention “accord[s] appropriate deference to the ‘respective competence of the state and federal court systems’” while “recogniz[ing] that abstention ‘does not, of course, involve the abdication of federal jurisdiction’”).

107. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1332(d)(3) (2006).

108. Lao v. Wickes Furniture Co., 455 F. Supp. 2d 1045, 1057 (C.D. Cal. 2006). Another, even less convincing analogy that some courts have tried to draw has been to compare § 1332(d)(3) and the two parts of § 1332(d)(4) to cases concerning state actions involving the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation that had been removed to federal court, where the statute requires that the opponent of removal must prove the “state action” exception to federal jurisdiction. These courts have reasoned that when the FDIC removes a case filed in state court, after it satisfies its burden of showing federal jurisdiction is proper,

We will return in a moment to the problem of reconciling § 1332(d)(3) and the two sections of § 1332(d)(4) and the other mandatory carve-outs in the statute. Before we do that, though, we turn to the last, and what turns out to be best, argument for burden shifting: the text and its placement in the statutory context.

E. TEXT AND CONTEXT

The remaining argument for shifting the burden focuses on the language and structure of the statute. As is always the case with questions of statutory interpretation,<sup>109</sup> the best starting place in ascertaining Congress's intent with regard to the burden of proof under CAFA is from the statutory text itself.

1. LOOKING AT TEXT

The least persuasive treatments of the text summarily characterize §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) as “exceptions” to the grant of federal jurisdiction in § 1332(d)(2). By summarily I mean that courts, like the Eleventh Circuit in Evans and Fifth Circuit in Frazier, provide neither an explanation for what language qualifies as an “exception” to jurisdiction nor explain how we can know these provisions so qualify. The conclusions these courts reach—which are virtually identical in structure and content—are bare, punctuated only by a citation to Breuer for the proposition that, having found that § 1332(d)(3) and the two provisions in § 1332(d)(4) are exceptions to federal jurisdiction, the burden is on the plaintiff to prove their applicability.<sup>110</sup>

More cogent is the Seventh Circuit's treatment in Hart v. FedEx Ground Package System, Inc.<sup>111</sup> and the Ninth Circuit's in Serrano v. 180 Connect, Inc.<sup>112</sup> which focus better on the language in the statute. The courts in these cases distinguish the jurisdiction granting language in § 1332(d)(2) (“[t]he district courts shall have original jurisdiction”)<sup>113</sup> from the language in § 1332(d)(3) and § 1332(d)(4) (respectively, the court “may decline” and “shall decline” to exercise jurisdiction).<sup>114</sup> Keying on this dif-

---

the burden of proving an exception exists is borne by the party objecting to removal. Whatever problems exist with trying to divine congressional intent as to §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) by reference to its passage of an unrelated statute composed of different jurisdiction granting- and limiting-language, other courts have declined to follow this reasoning. See Hart v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 457 F.3d 675, 680 (7th Cir. 2006).

109. See, e.g., Exxon Mobil Corp. v. Allapattah Servs., Inc., 545 U.S. 546, 568 (2005) (“As we have repeatedly held, the authoritative statement is the statutory text, not the legislative history or any other extrinsic material. Extrinsic materials have a role in statutory interpretation only to the extent they shed a reliable light on the enacting Legislature's understanding of otherwise ambiguous terms.”).

110. See Frazier v. Pioneer Ams. LLC, 455 F.3d 542, 546 (5th Cir. 2006); Evans v. Walter Indus., Inc., 449 F.3d 1159, 1164 (11th Cir. 2006).

111. 457 F.3d at 675.

112. 478 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 2007).

113. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1332(d)(2) (2006).

114. Id. §§ 1332(d)(3)–(d)(4).

ference in the language, both Hart and Serrano adjudge that Congress must have meant these to be “exceptions” to the grant of jurisdiction in § 1332(d)(2).<sup>115</sup> Recollecting § 1441’s opening, “[e]xcept as otherwise expressly provided by Act of Congress,”<sup>116</sup> Hart and Serrano conclude that creating such exceptions to jurisdiction is what Congress had in mind by formulating § 1332(d)(3) and the two sections of § 1332(d)(4) with different words than those found in § 1332(d)(2).<sup>117</sup> The fit is far from perfect, however—after all, neither § 1332(d)(3) nor either part of § 1332(d)(4) are expressly identified by the words “except” or “exception,” as in § 1441, or even words to similar effect—and the court in Hart at least had the good graces to concede its reading was not airtight.<sup>118</sup> In any event, having catalogued these subsections as “exceptions” to jurisdiction, it took only a citation to Breuer for both courts to conclude that the burden should properly rest with the party trying to prove these “exceptions” to apply.<sup>119</sup>

This suggests the first, real difficulty with Hart and Serrano’s reasoning: these courts are relying on their reading of Breuer in concluding that if §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) are indeed “exceptions” to jurisdiction then Congress must have meant for them to be proven by the party opposing jurisdiction. But we have already seen that Breuer is inapposite to this statutory question, that it said only that the plaintiff bears the unique burden of showing that Congress has taken the unusual step of providing for concurrent jurisdiction but withholding from the defendant a corresponding removal right. Thus, even if § 1332(d)(3) and the two parts of § 1332(d)(4) are “exceptions,” Breuer does not compel the conclusion that the statute triggers a burden shift.<sup>120</sup> Congress may or may not have intended to shift the burden of proof as to §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) to the party opposing federal jurisdiction, but merely calling them “exceptions” does nothing to prove this one way or the other. Indeed, as we have already observed, the courts routinely require the party who desires to litigate in the federal forum to bear the burden of proof as to other, more familiar statutory provisions that act as limitations on and exceptions to the defendant’s removal rights.<sup>121</sup>

A second difficulty with the kind of textual argument advanced by Hart and Serrano is that, on closer examination, there is no effort to contrast the existing language with some other formulation and to ask whether the choice Congress made thereby reveals the legislative purpose. Neither court contrasts “may decline” and “must decline” in §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) with other formulations Congress could have chosen. Consider, instead, the rele-

---

115. See Serrano, 478 F.3d at 1023; Hart, 457 F.3d at 681.

116. 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a) (2000).

117. See Serrano, 478 F.3d at 1023; Hart, 457 F.3d at 680–81.

118. Hart, 457 F.3d at 680 (“Although the match is not perfect, the relation between subparts (d)(2) and (d)(4) of CAFA is analogous to the structure of 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a), which the Supreme Court examined in Breuer.”).

119. Serrano, 478 F.3d at 1023; Hart, 457 F.3d at 680–81.

120. See supra Part II.C.

121. See supra text accompanying notes 4, 16, and 43.

vant passage from Hart: “It is reasonable to understand [1332(d)(4)(A) and 1332(d)(4)(B)] as two ‘express exceptions’ to CAFA’s normal jurisdictional rule, as the Supreme Court used that term in Breuer.”<sup>122</sup> But what makes it reasonable? The court does not say.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about characterizing § 1332(d)(3) and § 1332(d)(4) as “exceptions” is that this conclusion only makes sense if we ignore the actual text of the statute Congress passed. As it turns out, elsewhere in the statute Congress identified other subsections expressly as “exceptions.” Section 1453(d), which is titled “Exception,” begins: “This section shall not apply to any class action that solely involves” a claim for a “covered security” or fiduciary actions under the Securities Act of 1933 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, and actions concerning intra-corporate governance.<sup>123</sup> And note the phrasing used here: “shall not apply to.”<sup>124</sup> This same language also appears in § 1332(d)(5) and § 1332(d)(9), other sections that limit the scope of CAFA’s jurisdictional reach.<sup>125</sup> One certainly can read this mirroring of language as compelling evidence Congress meant these subject matters to be “exceptions” to CAFA jurisdiction and that, where Congress used different phrases (“may decline” and “shall decline”) in § 1332(d)(3) and § 1332(d)(4), it meant for these subsections to be treated as something other than exceptions.<sup>126</sup>

And then there is § 1332(d)(11). This is the other place where Congress used the word “except.” Section 1332(d)(11) is perhaps the best proof that characterizing a provision as an “exception” to jurisdiction need not necessarily trigger a shift in the burden of proof. Subsection § 1332(d)(11)(B)(i) provides that jurisdiction will exist over a mass action that meets certain criteria “except that jurisdiction shall exist only over those plaintiffs whose claims in a mass action satisfy the jurisdictional amount requirements under subsection (a).”<sup>127</sup> The question that this language raises is whether all plaintiffs in a mass action must have a minimum amount in controversy of $75,000 each in order for the court to have jurisdiction or whether the court can individually remand those plaintiffs whose claims are determined to be below the $75,000 threshold.

In wrestling with this issue, the Ninth Circuit in Abrego Abrego concluded that the threshold requirement to be borne by the party trying to

---

122. Hart, 457 F.3d at 681.

123. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1453(d) (2006).

124. Id.

125. Id. §§ 1332(d)(5), 1332(d)(9).

126. These textual differences have not been lost on everyone but their significance, oddly, has often been marginalized. For instance, Professor Stephen Shapiro provides an otherwise good account of how parties are to discharge their burdens of proof under the statute, but his acceptance of the characterization of §§ 1332(d)(3) and 1332(d)(4) and the perceived importance of Breuer leads him to treat the statutory text inadequately. See Stephen J. Shapiro, Applying the Jurisdictional Provisions of the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005: In Search of a Sensible Judicial Approach, 59 BAYLOR L. REV. 77, 102 (2007) (“While the language of these provisions is different than the language used for the other exceptions, there is nothing inherent in that language to indicate that the provisions were meant to be something other than exceptions to the general grant of jurisdiction.”).

127. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1332(d)(11)(B)(i).

demonstrate the existence of jurisdiction under § 1332(d)(11) is to show that there is at least one plaintiff whose claim exceeds $75,000.<sup>128</sup> The Eleventh Circuit in Lowery also wrestled with this question but never answered it because the court determined that the defendant had failed to meet its preliminary obligation of showing the aggregate amount in controversy to be over $5,000,000.<sup>129</sup>

What all this means is that whether any import attaches to a subsection's characterization as an "exception" to jurisdiction (little, in my view: as we have seen, merely calling something an "exception" tells us nothing about where Congress intended the burden of proof to lie), had Congress intended §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) to be regarded similarly it—at the least—would have also expressly titled them as "exceptions" and tracked language similar to that which it used in § 1453(d) and § 1332(d)(11). That it did not seem to be pretty powerful evidence Congress had no such intention.

2. LOOKING AT CONTEXT

In addition to the language in the text, another argument Hart found persuasive was in the placement of the language.<sup>130</sup> That is, the court also thought that strong evidence of congressional intent could be found in Congress's decision to place §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) in sections separate from § 1332(d)(2).<sup>131</sup> The court observed that its conclusion might have been different if Congress "had put the home-state and local controversy rules

---

128. Abrego Abrego v. Dow Chem. Co., 443 F.3d 676, 689–90 (9th Cir. 2006).

129. Lowery v. Ala. Power Co., 483 F.3d 1184, 1218–19 (11th Cir. 2007). Although it did not reach the question whether a single plaintiff must be shown to have a claim worth at least $75,000 under § 1332(d)(11), Lowery nevertheless suggests that, if such a requirement exists, it was favorably inclined to the view that the burden should rest with the party opposing federal jurisdiction to show which plaintiffs have claims in excess of $75,000. See id. at 1203–04.

We note in passing that the law of this circuit shifts the burden of proving the applicability of exceptions to CAFA's removal jurisdiction to the plaintiff seeking a remand. See Evans, 449 F.3d at 1164 (shifting the burden of proof onto the plaintiff where the plaintiff sought "to avail itself of an express statutory exception [i.e., the local controversy exception] to federal jurisdiction granted under CAFA"). The defendants urge us to read Evans as shifting the burden onto the plaintiffs to prove which, if any, of the plaintiffs do not have claims exceeding the $75,000 amount in controversy included in 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(11)(B)(i). Although we find the argument quite compelling, we decline to address it here.

Id. at 1208 n.55. This reading, of course, would be inconsistent with the Ninth Circuit's conclusion that the existence of at least one $75,000 claim is a threshold requirement to be borne by the party trying to demonstrate the existence of jurisdiction under d(11). See supra note 128. Such inconsistent results—between circuits otherwise in agreement as to allocation of the burden of proof on §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4)—does much to help illustrate the impact that the courts' misreading of Breuer is having. Indeed, even courts that have correctly resisted the idea that Congress intended to place the burden of proof as to §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) on the party opposing federal jurisdiction nevertheless assume that as express exceptions §§ 1332(d)(5), (d)(9), and (d)(11) must be proven by the party opposing federal jurisdiction. See Lao v. Wickes Furniture Co., 455 F. Supp. 2d 1045, 1059 (C.D. Cal. 2006) ("Subsections (d)(5) and (9) are therefore truly exceptions to (d)(2)'s removal provisions, while subsection (d)(4) forms a part and parcel of subsection (d)(2)'s definitional scope.")

130. Hart v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 457 F.3d 675, 680–81 (7th Cir. 2006).

131. Id. at 681.

directly into the jurisdictional section of the statute, § 1332(d)(2), but it did not.<sup>132</sup>

That is worth thinking about further. What if Congress had written § 1332(d)(2) so that what is now §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) were all part of the same paragraph? It would look something like this (for the sake of brevity, I am not reproducing here all of the language after each subsection):

The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action in which the matter in controversy exceeds but . . . (A) a district court may, in the interests of justice and looking at the totality of the circumstances, decline to exercise jurisdiction over a class action in which greater than one-third but less than two-thirds of the members of all proposed plaintiff classes . . . and (B) a district court shall decline to exercise jurisdiction under paragraph over a class action in which greater than two-thirds of the members of all proposed plaintiff classes . . .<sup>133</sup>

There it is, all in one place. Would this placement make a difference?

With due respect to Hart, it is hard to see how this new structure is more revealing evidence that Congress intended to leave the entire burden on the party seeking to maintain the suit in federal court. As the court in Lao has already realized, focusing on whether Congress placed the jurisdiction-limiting language alongside, instead of separately from, the jurisdiction-granting language in § 1332(d)(2) ignores § 1441.<sup>134</sup> In the general removal statute, Congress expressly and famously placed an exception right along with a grant of jurisdiction.

Additionally, even if we were to give credence to the idea that placement of these provisions matters, Hart ignores that the case for burden shifting would be far stronger had Congress placed all of the jurisdiction-conferring sections in one place (say, in § 1332(d)(2)), and articulated the home state and local controversy sections in separate paragraphs. Instead, these two jurisdiction limiting provisions were sandwiched in the middle of the different jurisdiction-conferring sections, a point that Hart glosses over. According to the court, following the jurisdiction-conferring language in § 1332(d)(2) the “statute goes on to say” when the district court must decline jurisdiction.<sup>135</sup> But, in fact, the statute does not “go on” to say anything. The exceptions are bracketed on both sides by jurisdiction-conferring rules in § 1332(d)(2) and § 1332(d)(5), as Hart even acknowledges.<sup>136</sup> Indeed, § 1332(d)(11)(A) also includes what have been considered jurisdiction-conferring rules for mass actions under CAFA.<sup>137</sup> That makes Hart’s reli-

---

132. Id.

133. See 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1332(d)(2)–(d)(4) (2006).

134. Lao, 455 F. Supp. 2d at 1055–61.

135. Hart, 457 F.3d at 679.

136. Id. (citing to both § 1332(d)(2) and § 1332(d)(5) as jurisdiction-conferring rules in CAFA).

137. See Lowery v. Ala. Power Co., 483 F.3d 1184, 1199 (11th Cir. 2007) (for a “mass action” to be ance on statutory structure seem even less plausible as evidence of Congress's intent to treat (d)(3) and (d)(4) differently by virtue of their placement in the statute. Had Congress really meant to signal a distinction that jurisdiction-conferring sections and jurisdiction-limiting sections were to be treated differently based on their placement in the statute, one assumes it would have more cleanly separated the two from each other.

III. READING SECTIONS 1332(D)(3) AND (D)(4), AS WELL AS (D)(5) AND (D)(9), AS NON-WAIVABLE JURISDICTIONAL PROVISIONS

I have shown thus far that in trying to divine legislative intent with regard to the allocation of the burden of jurisdictional proof we should not place much stock in the characterization of §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) as “exceptions.” Even if that is what Congress meant them to be, merely calling them “exceptions” does not demonstrate Congress intended the party arguing for their applicability to bear the burden of proof. Breuer, correctly understood, does not stand for the proposition that all “exceptions” to jurisdiction must be proven by the party opposing it. In any event, such a proposition is belied by recognition that courts routinely require the party who desires to litigate in the federal forum to bear the burden of proof as to other, more familiar statutory provisions that act as limitations on and exceptions to the defendant's removal rights.<sup>138</sup>

In the absence of any express language regarding the burden of jurisdictional proof, a better approach is to consider whether Congress intended the conditions set forth in the statutory sections to be waivable (or voluntarily bargainable) conditions. That is, can we determine whether Congress expected parties to be able to waive, intentionally or inadvertently, arguments regarding the applicability of one of CAFA's provisions that plainly apply? Focusing on whether CAFA's provisions were meant to be waivable is a better approach because it helps to get at what we are really after with regard to the burden of proof debate in CAFA.

A. FOCUSING ON WAIVER

If a statutory rule or requirement can be waived, then it makes some sense to talk in terms of a legislative intent to shift the burden of proof as to that rule or requirement onto the party trying to demonstrate its applicability. This holds true even for some aspects of a court's jurisdiction. For instance, although a court without personal jurisdiction over a defendant is powerless to impose any binding order against it,<sup>139</sup> challenges to the exerdeemed a “class action” within the meaning of the statute, it has to meet the provisions of §§ 1332(d)(2) through (d)(11)).

---

138. See supra text accompanying note 4.

139. See generally Lonny Sheinkopf Hoffman, The Case Against Vicarious Jurisdiction, 152 U. PA. L. REV. 1023, 1023–24 (2004) (observing that for U.S. courts “judicial jurisdiction is as essential to institutional existence as oxygen is to human beings. Without it, courts are unable to render binding cise of personal jurisdiction over the defendant are subject to waiver if not timely brought.<sup>140</sup>

There is a far different presumption as to subject matter jurisdiction, however. To say that federal courts are courts of limited subject matter jurisdiction is to say, more precisely, that the ultimate burden of persuasion as to the court's subject matter jurisdiction rests with the party that desires to litigate there.<sup>141</sup> That is why federal judges, both trial and appellate, are given the extraordinary power and responsibility of determining on their own whether jurisdiction exists.<sup>142</sup> To be sure, Congress can reallocate and otherwise tinker with the quantum of proof obligations that parties bear in regards to a particular rule or statute that limits federal jurisdiction.<sup>143</sup> But it is notable that Congress has rarely done so. This explains why it is not surprising to find that the courts routinely require the party who desires to litigate in the federal forum to bear the burden of proof as to familiar provisions that limit removal rights, such as §§ 1441(b) and 1446(b).<sup>144</sup>

1. The Mandatory Language in CAFA

There are a number of good reasons for concluding that Congress similarly meant to treat §§ 1332(d)(4), (d)(5) and (d)(9) as nonwaivable rules of jurisdiction, whose inapplicability must be shown by the party desiring to litigate in the federal forum. The starting point in thinking about congressional intent with regard to party waiver and §§ 1332(d)(4), (d)(5) and (d)(9) is to observe that the language in all of these provisions is mandatory. To be sure, mandatory language need not always equate to nonwaivable rules. For instance, statutes of limitation provide that a case shall not be heard if brought more than X number of years later and are a classic example of the kind of affirmative defense that, if not timely raised, will be lost. In the context of subject matter rules that grant and limit the scope of a court's jurisdiction, however, the use of mandatory language is significant. By using "shall decline" and "shall not apply to,"<sup>145</sup> Congress, in these sections, can reasonably be read as having carved out space from the expanded grant of jurisdiction in § 1332(d)(2) such that a court is bound to make certain—which is to say it lacks any discretion to do otherwise—that any case coming within one of these provisions is dismissed or remanded. It does not seem likely that if the legislature had intended §§ 1332(d)(4), (d)(5) and judgments; without it, they are paper tigers.”).

---

140. See, e.g., FED. R. CIV. P. 12(g), 12(h)(1).

141. Cf. United States v. Swiss Am. Bank, Ltd., 191 F.3d 30, 41 (1st Cir. 1999) (implementing a burden-shifting model for Rule 4(k)(2) and citing Stephen B. Burbank, The United States' Approach to International Civil Litigation: Recent Developments in Forum Selection, 19 U. PA. J. INT'L ECON. L. 1, 13 (1998)).

142. See FED. R. CIV. P. 12(h)(3) (“Whenever it appears by suggestion of the parties or otherwise that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter, the court shall dismiss the action.”).

143. See infra text accompanying notes 168–175.

144. See supra note 4.

145. 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1332(d)(4)–(d)(5) (2006).

(d)(5) to be waivable conditions it would have gone out of its way to use mandatory language in the sections. The formulations of “shall decline” and “shall not apply to” seem ill-suited for use as rules that a party can choose to ignore, if she wants to.<sup>146</sup>

Alongside these mandatory carve outs, § 1332(d)(3) stands in stark contrast. Here, Congress used discretionary language which, at least when we compare it directly to the “shall decline” and “shall not apply to” formulations elsewhere in the statute, reads with considerably more pliancy. Congress previously used such discretionary abstention language—and only such discretionary language—in § 1367(c), a jurisdictional statute that has been treated as subject to party waiver.<sup>147</sup> But if § 1332(d)(3) and § 1367(c) resemble each other, it is hard to draw analogies between CAFA and a statute that only contains discretionary abstention language and no comparable mandatory formulations.

Perhaps even more telling than the use of the mandatory language in § 1332(d)(4), as contrasted with the discretionary phrasing in § 1332(d)(3), is to also consider what Congress could have said if it really had intended to make these CAFA provisions subject to party waiver. In this regard, one point of comparison to consider is 28 U.S.C. § 1334(c)(2):

Upon timely motion of a party in a proceeding based upon a State law claim or State law cause of action, related to a case under title 11 but not arising under title 11 or arising in a case under title 11, with respect to which an action could not have been commenced in a court of the United States absent jurisdiction under this section, the district court shall abstain from hearing such proceeding if an action is commenced, and can be timely adjudicated, in a State forum of appropriate jurisdiction.<sup>148</sup>

“Upon timely motion of a party”<sup>149</sup> sends an unmistakable message that the nature of this statutory brand of mandatory abstention is more like a personal jurisdiction challenge than a true limitation on the grant of jurisdiction to the court. This, indeed, also is precisely the way the same distinction between waivable and non-waivable rules is drawn in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.<sup>150</sup> Just as the failure to timely file a personal jurisdiction challenge amounts to waiver of otherwise ironclad proof of nonamenability,

---

146. Lao v. Wickes Furniture Co., 455 F. Supp. 2d 1045, 1059 (C.D. Cal. 2006) (observing that the mandatory provisions in (d)(4)(A) and (d)(4)(B) are “a part and parcel of subsection (d)(2)’s definitional scope”).

147. See Acri v. Varian Assocs., Inc., 114 F.3d 999, 1000–01 (9th Cir. 1997) (en banc).

148. 28 U.S.C. § 1334(c)(2) (2000).

149. Id.

150. Compare FED. R. CIV. P. 12(h)(1) (“A defense of lack of jurisdiction over the person . . . is waived (A) if omitted from a motion in the circumstances described in subdivision (g), or (B) if it is neither made by motion under this rule nor included in a responsive pleading or an amendment thereof . . .”), with FED. R. CIV. P. 12(h)(3) (“Whenever it appears by suggestion of the parties or otherwise that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter, the court shall dismiss the action.”) (emphasis added).

absent a timely motion under § 1334(c)(2) any argument for abstention—however substantively valid—is nullified.

The claim I am making is not that the Congress had to track this same language in §§ 1332(d)(4), (d)(5) and (d)(9) to demonstrate its intent to make the limitations on jurisdiction in these sections waivable. Certainly, such language is not necessary to create waivable conditions. As noted above, § 1367(c) makes no reference to a party's obligations but nevertheless may be an example of a rule that is subject to party waiver.<sup>151</sup> The point, instead, is that there were a number of ways in which Congress could have demonstrated its intention to treat §§ 1332(d)(4), (d)(5) and (d)(9) as waivable rules: it could have used only discretionary abstention language in all of the CAFA provisions, akin to what it did in § 1367(c), or required the timely filing of a motion by a party who desires to rely on one of these sections; but it did none of these things. We may say, then, that the “shall decline” and “shall not apply to” language in §§ 1332(d)(4), (d)(5) and (d)(9), along with the lack of clear waiver language, such as that found in 28 U.S.C. § 1334(c)(2) and in the contrasting formulations between waivable and nonwaivable defenses found in Rule 12 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, provide powerful textual evidence that CAFA's mandatory carve-outs are more in the nature of conditions that cannot be involuntarily waived or bargained for.<sup>152</sup>

2. The Relevance of “Decline”

But wait. Isn't there is a difference, we might ask, between “shall decline” in § 1332(d)(4) and the use of “shall not apply to” in (d)(5) and (d)(9)? In other words, can we not discern in the legislative choice to use “decline” an intention to shift the burden of jurisdictional proof to the party who seeks the federal court to stay its hand under (d)(4)?

Although the phrasing in (d)(4) is peculiar, the better view is to recognize the entire, mandatory phrase “shall decline” and not to read into the solitary word “decline,” itself and alone, a legislative signal to shift the burden of persuasion as to the court's subject matter jurisdiction. To see why this is the better view, assume for argument's sake that instead of providing that the district court “shall decline jurisdiction” the statutory subsection tracked (d)(5) to provide that “the jurisdiction granted in (d)(2) “shall not apply to” cases coming within (d)(4)” or (perhaps even more pointedly) had provided that the court “shall not have jurisdiction when the (d)(4) criteria apply.” Would this amount to better evidence that Congress intended the home state and local controversy sections to be integrated into a jurisdic-

---

151. See supra note 147.

152. Cf. Hirschbach v. NVE Bank, 496 F. Supp. 2d 451, 460 (D.N.J. 2007) (observing that “[w]hatever the burden-bearing rule may be in this Circuit, it is the Court itself that is not satisfied that this case does not fall within the home state exception to CAFA jurisdiction” and remanding suit).

tional grant and, thus, part of the burden to be borne by the party seeking federal jurisdiction?

As a practical matter, there would seem to be little operational difference between the statutory language Congress chose and our hypothetical phrasing. Both limit the jurisdictional reach of § 1332(d)(2) and, constructively, in the same way. If one of the subparts of § 1332(d)(4) applies, that is it; the court has to dismiss or remand the case. Perhaps it would have been less opaque to use “shall not have” jurisdiction or “shall not apply” to signal their nonwaivability; but focusing only on the word “decline” is equally problematic because it ignores that Congress chose different preceding verbs in (d)(3) and (d)(4). Standing alone, the use of “decline” in (d)(4) tells us nothing about what Congress meant with regard to the jurisdictional burden of proof in CAFA.<sup>153</sup>

We can also compare the language in § 1332(d)(4) to other similar statutory formulations. There are no exact statutory comparables to (d)(4) and its peculiar choice of “shall decline.” In the past, when Congress has used the word “decline” in a jurisdictional statute, it has appended discretion to it, as in a district court “may decline” jurisdiction in such and such circumstances. The most prominent example is 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c), as we have seen. But if § 1367(c) and § 1332(d)(3) share some common ground, § 1332(d)(4)’s closest cousin is surely 28 U.S.C. § 1369(b) from the Multi-party, Multiforum, Trial Jurisdiction Act of 2002 (MMTJA).<sup>154</sup> Section 1369(b) provides:

The district court shall abstain from hearing any civil action described in subsection (a) in which—

- (1) the substantial majority of all plaintiffs are citizens of a single State of which the primary defendants are also citizens; and

---

153. In considering the existing language in (d)(4), one district court thought the mandatory phrasing susceptible to more than one interpretation, that is, of “signifying either Congress’ attempt to create a form of statutory abstention, or simply its inartful way of further refining subsection (d)(2)’s jurisdictional criteria.” Lao v. Wickes Furniture Co., 455 F. Supp. 2d 1045, 1057 (C.D. Cal. 2006).

154. 28 U.S.C. § 1369. Two other, less related examples, are § 9(E) of the Small Business Act, 15 U.S.C. § 637 (“The adjudicator selected to preside over a proceeding conducted under the authority of this paragraph shall decline to accept jurisdiction over any matter that— (i) does not, on its face, allege facts that, if proven to be true, would warrant reversal or modification of the Administration’s position; (ii) is untimely filed; (iii) is not filed in accordance with the rules of procedure governing such proceedings; or (iv) has been decided by or is the subject of an adjudication before a court of competent jurisdiction over such matters.”); and the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. § 1920 (“Where any petitioner in an Indian child custody proceeding before a State court has improperly removed the child from custody of the parent or Indian custodian or has improperly retained custody after a visit or other temporary relinquishment of custody, the court shall decline jurisdiction over such petition and shall forthwith return the child to his parent or Indian custodian unless returning the child to his parent or custodian would subject the child to a substantial and immediate danger or threat of such danger.”).

(2) the claims asserted will be governed primarily by the laws of that State.<sup>155</sup>

If we could divine legislative intent with regard to § 1369(b) that would be important evidence as to congressional intent in § 1332(d)(4), not only because there is a resemblance between the “shall abstain” formulation in § 1369(b) and “shall decline” in § 1332(d)(4) but also, and of equal significance, because MMTJA was CAFA’s most immediate, if less comprehensive, statutory ancestor.<sup>156</sup>

Although the text of § 1369(b) may give no greater purchase than that in § 1332(d)(4), § 1369(b)’s title is important. Congress chose to precede this section with the title, “LIMITATION OF JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURTS.”<sup>157</sup> While it is appropriate not to overread this evidence, characterization of the statutory form of mandatory abstention in § 1369(b) as an express limitation on jurisdiction would appear to offer some evidence of legislative intent to treat this provision, like other subject matter jurisdictional rules are treated, as not subject to party waiver. Thus, because there is a close resemblance between the legislative framing of these two sections which appear in related statutes, the better textual argument is to read 1332(d)(4) as a nonwaivable limitation of subject matter jurisdiction.

3. Jurisdictional v. Claims-Processing Rules

A still further point that can be made about the mandatory language in CAFA’s jurisdiction limiting provisions is that treating them as nonwaivable rules is consistent with the Court’s recent efforts to distinguish jurisdictional rules from those that are non-jurisdictional. The Court has distinguished, on the one hand, between subject matter jurisdictional rules, which are rules that define “classes of cases”<sup>158</sup> to which a statute does or does not apply, and what it calls “claim-processing rules.”<sup>159</sup> The first case to draw this distinction was Kontrick v. Ryan,<sup>160</sup> where the Court held that a party’s failure to timely meet a filing requirement in the bankruptcy rules did not

---

155. 28 U.S.C. § 1369(b).

156. No court has directly spoken to what Congress meant in terms of the jurisdictional burden of proof in § 1369(b). See Burbank, supra note 12, at 69-70. The Fifth Circuit’s decision in Wallace v. Louisiana Citizens Property Insurance Corp., 444 F.3d 697 (5th Cir. 2006)—the only circuit court opinion to interpret the Act—comes closest. Section 1369(b), the court says, is an abstention provision. It assumes subject matter jurisdiction under § 1369(a), but abstains where the “substantial majority” of the plaintiffs and the “primary defendants” are citizens of the same state and the claims at issue are “governed primarily by the laws of that State.” It does not deprive federal courts of subject matter jurisdiction, but rather, acts as a limitation upon the exercise of jurisdiction granted in § 1369(a).

Id. at 701. Wallace thus reinforces a view that it is possible to distinguish between jurisdiction-conferring and jurisdiction-limiting rules. But Wallace says nothing about who bears the burden of proof as to the applicability of this mandatory abstention doctrine.

157. Id.

158. Kontrick v. Ryan, 540 U.S. 443, 455 (2004).

159. Id. at 454.

160. Id. at 443.

deprive the court of subject matter jurisdiction.<sup>161</sup> “[T]he label ‘jurisdictional’ [is appropriate] not for claim-processing rules,” the Court wrote, “but only for prescriptions delineating the classes of cases (subject-matter jurisdiction) and the persons (personal jurisdiction) falling within a court’s adjudicatory authority.”<sup>162</sup> The distinction seems now firmly established in a line of cases stretching forward from Kontrick,<sup>163</sup> as even both the majority and dissent in the recent and controversial Bowles v. Russell<sup>164</sup> case recognized, though they disagreed mightily over its application to the time limitation in that case.<sup>165</sup>

To be sure, these cases struggle with the proper characterization of rules in deciding different ultimate questions. In Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp., for instance, the Court was after the distinction between jurisdictional issues and issues that go to the substantive merits of the claim under federal law (namely, whether the defendant had fewer than the minimum number of employees, for if it did, the federal statute did not purport to regulate its conduct).<sup>166</sup> Similarly, Kontrick, Scarborough, Eberhart, and Bowles all had to decide how best to characterize rules that set out time limits with which the parties in those cases, for different reasons, had failed to comply.<sup>167</sup>

But the distinction between “claims processing” and “jurisdictional” rules set out in these cases nevertheless should inform our thinking about CAFA as well. Whatever one thinks of the proper characterization of a time deadline imposed (by judge or by rule), §§ 1332(d)(4), (d)(5) and (d)(9), along with § 1369(b), are plainly not claims-processing rules. Instead, they indisputably mark the classes of cases to which the statute applies.

To be sure, Congress can always reallocate the burden of proof as to a particular jurisdictional rule. The traditional understanding, however, is that the burden is borne by the party trying to establish the rule’s applicability.<sup>168</sup> By writing rules that are plainly jurisdictional—in the classic sense that they are rules that delineate the classes of cases within and beyond the federal court’s adjudicatory authority—and without expressly reallocating the burden of jurisdictional proof—CAFA’s provisions should be read as not departing from the traditional formula.<sup>169</sup>

---

161. Id. at 459–60.

162. Id. at 455.

163. See Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 510–16 (2006); Eberhart v. United States, 546 U.S. 12, 15–20 (2005); Scarborough v. Principi, 541 U.S. 401, 413–14 (2004).

164. 127 S. Ct. 2360 (2007).

165. See id.

166. Arbaugh, 546 U.S. at 503–04.

167. Bowles, 127 S. Ct. at 2362; Eberhart, 546 U.S. at 19–20; Scarborough, 541 U.S. at 405–06; Kontrick, 540 U.S. at 458–60.

168. McNutt v. Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp. of Ind., Inc., 298 U.S. 178, 189 (1936).

169. Cf. Rockwell Int’l Corp. v. United States, 127 S. Ct. 1397, 1405 (2007) (stating that “a clear and explicit withdrawal of jurisdiction . . . undoubtedly [withdraws jurisdiction]”); Arbaugh, 546 U.S. at 515–16 (“If the Legislature clearly states that a threshold limitation on a statute’s scope shall count as jurisdictional, then courts and litigants will be duly instructed and will not be left to wrestle with the issue.”).

4. Legislating Against Backdrop of Existing Law

This suggests a last, and broader, reason for regarding the statutory language in §§ 1332(d)(4), (d)(5), and (d)(9) as placing on the party seeking to litigate in federal court the burden of proof as to the inapplicability of these sections. An additional important consideration in interpreting what Congress intended as to the burden of proof is to recall that Congress legislates with an awareness of existing law.<sup>170</sup> Indeed, in rejecting the defendant's bid to shift the burden of proof as to the prima facie jurisdictional case, the Eleventh Circuit, in Miedema v. Maytag Corp., specifically relied on this longstanding legal precept: "While the text of CAFA plainly expands federal jurisdiction over class actions and facilitates their removal, '[w]e presume that Congress legislates against the backdrop of established principles of state and federal common law, and that when it wishes to deviate from deeply rooted principles, it will say so.'" <sup>171</sup>

It is hard to square this awareness with the subsequent decision by another panel of the Eleventh Circuit in Evans to shift the burden of proof as to §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4), even though Congress was no more explicit as to the jurisdictional burden in these sections than it was in § 1332(d)(2).<sup>172</sup> As we have seen, there are other, more familiar examples in the removal statutes where Congress imposed limitations on and exceptions to the defendant's right to remove a state case to federal court, and the courts have always required that the defendant prove they do not preclude her from gaining the federal forum.<sup>173</sup> Congress could have chosen to ignore the traditional practice and allocate the burden of proof as to CAFA's provisions elsewhere, of course; but it did not expressly do so. Just as the courts have recognized that Congress legislates against the backdrop of existing law and thereby refuse to shift the threshold burden of jurisdictional proof,<sup>174</sup> so should we apply a similar understanding as to CAFA's other provisions.<sup>175</sup>

---

170. See Abrego Abrego v. Dow Chem. Co., 443 F.3d 676, 684 (9th Cir. 2006) (noting that in construing CAFA courts should be mindful that "[g]iven the care taken in CAFA to reverse certain established principles but not others, the usual presumption that Congress legislates against an understanding of pertinent legal principles has particular force").

171. Miedema v. Maytag Corp., 450 F.3d 1322, 1329 (11th Cir. 2006) (quoting United States v. Baxter Int'l, Inc., 345 F.3d 866, 900 (11th Cir. 2003)).

172. See 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1332(d)(2)–(d)(4) (2006).

173. See supra text accompanying notes 28–46.

174. See supra text accompanying notes 170–171.

175. The assumption that Congress was aware the jurisdictional burden has always rested with the party seeking to maintain suit in the federal forum calls to mind Einer Elhauge's "preference-eliciting default" rule. See Einer Elhauge, Preference-Eliciting Statutory Default Rules, 102 COLUM. L. REV. 2162, 2165 (2002). Basically, Elhauge's rule provides that if in doubt because the words of a statute are not clear, the court should reject the statutory interpretation that favors the most "politically powerful group with ready access to the legislative agenda." Id. at 2165. The idea here is that, if it turns out the court's reading of the statute was not what Congress had in mind, then such a group has a better chance of actually getting Congress to come back and be more explicit next time. Id. at 2165–66 (arguing, inter alia, that a "preference-eliciting default rule . . . is more likely to provoke a legislative reaction that resolves the statutory indeterminacy and thus creates an ultimate statutory result that reflects enactable political preferences more accurately than any judicial estimate possibly could"). Given the success of

B. RECONCILING §§ 1332(d)(3) AND (d)(4)

So far, so good. The mandatory language in §§ 1332(d)(4), (d)(5) and (d)(9) are best read as nonwaivable jurisdictional rules whose nonapplicability must be shown by the party seeking to litigate in federal court. But that leaves one remaining puzzle: how, then, to characterize § 1332(d)(3)? Earlier I bracketed the problem of trying to reconcile § 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4).<sup>176</sup> At first glance, the side-by-side inclusion of discretionary and mandatory language might appear problematic. We have already observed that if § 1332(d)(3) and its discretionary language is likened to abstention doctrines, one could reasonably decide Congress meant to place the burden on the party trying to prove the section applicable; but that account cannot be squared with the two provisions in § 1332(d)(4).<sup>177</sup> Why should we favor one inconsistent reading over another?

One answer is that we do not have to. We could read the mandatory carve-outs in § 1332(d)(4)(A) and (d)(4)(B) as evidence that Congress intended these sections—and not § 1332(d)(3)—to be treated as part of the threshold jurisdictional case. Such a reading finds support in the Court’s recent observation in Bowles v. Russell that “[b]ecause Congress decides whether federal courts can hear cases at all, it can also determine when, and under what conditions, federal courts can hear them.”<sup>178</sup> Thus, Congress could have intended for the ultimate jurisdictional burden of persuasion to be borne by the party seeking the federal forum only for the mandatory carve-outs, and not the discretionary one.<sup>179</sup>

Although plausible, it is better to construe the statute as leaving the burden of jurisdictional proof for both § 1332(d)(3) and the two mandatory carve-outs in (d)(4) on the party trying to maintain the suit in federal court. There are several reasons for this.

We have already observed that the mandatory aspect of the two carve outs in § 1332(d)(4) suggests there really is no other way to adequately con-the United States Chamber of Commerce and other business groups in shepherding CAFA through to passage in February 2005, Elhauge’s rule suggests it may be appropriate to favor the conclusion that Congress did not intend to shift the burden of jurisdictional proof from the place it has always rested. If that interpretation is wrong, those groups are in a far better position to try to correct it than the converse. On the other hand, one could argue that the political winds have already shifted and that the window of opportunity these groups possessed to influence public policy reform of complex litigation has now closed.

---

176. See supra text accompanying note 108.

177. See supra text accompanying notes 104–108.

178. 127 S. Ct. 2360, 2365 (2007).

179. Alternately, we could read the difference between “may decline” and “shall decline” as signaling an intent to shift the burden of production as to § 1332(d)(3) onto the party trying to prove its applicability, but leave the burden of production as to (d)(4) and the burden of persuasion as to both on the party desiring to remain in federal court. This is not an unreasonable approach, given the close but notably different formulations in (d)(3) and (d)(4). On the other hand, this cuts the onion rather finely. It is not that Congress is unable to do so, but had this been the legislative intent, one expects it would have been addressed more directly. That, and the reasons I elaborate below, suggest the better construction is to assume Congress intended both the burden of production and persuasion as to both sections to rest with the party who seeks to litigate in federal court.

ceptualize these provisions except as nonwaivable jurisdictional rules.<sup>180</sup> That is not true as to (d)(3), but these three subsections indisputably are of a piece with one another. Section 1332(d)(3) covers cases where between one-third and two-thirds of the proposed class members and the primary defendants are forum citizens.<sup>181</sup> Correspondingly, § 1332(d)(4)(A) comes into play when more than two-thirds of the putative class and at least one defendant is a forum citizen and is alleged to bear “significant” responsibility for the plaintiffs’ alleged injuries, while its counterpart, § 1332(d)(4)(B) covers roughly the same class size but provides a different formulation as to the defendants.<sup>182</sup> It would be peculiar if Congress meant for the burden of jurisdictional proof to vary among such closely related cousins, especially when it said nothing explicitly about treating them differently. We should interpret the choice to track similar language in § 1332(d)(3) as indicative that Congress was signaling it wanted the subsections to be treated similarly.

Second, and in a similar vein, there will be considerable overlap in the factual jurisdictional proof that will be required for § 1332(d)(3) and for the two parts of § 1332(d)(4). It is hard to imagine that Congress would have meant for the defendant (in a removal context) to prove that less than two-thirds of the class are forum citizens but that, once such evidence has been tendered, the burden then would shift to the plaintiff to prove that between one third and two thirds of the putative class is comprised of forum citizens. It makes far more practical sense for Congress to have kept the burden as to (d)(3) and both provisions in (d)(4) on the party trying to remain in federal court.

That leaves us with only one other option. Since the legislative choice of language in (d)(4) is powerful evidence of congressional intent that these provisions be treated as nonwaivable jurisdictional rules, the best conclusion is that Congress also intended for the party seeking to invoke the federal forum to bear the burden of proving the nonapplicability of (d)(3). It is difficult to make a credible case that, without saying so expressly, Congress intended to depart from existing law and, on top of that, engaged in a precise, scalpel-like reallocation of the burden of jurisdictional proof, shifting it as to (d)(3) onto the party opposing federal jurisdiction but leaving it on the one desiring to litigate in federal court as to (d)(4). I take seriously Congress’ awareness of the traditional legal rule that the party seeking to establish jurisdiction has the burden of proving its existence.<sup>183</sup> It is free to depart from this traditional approach, but we should not read into the statute an intent to do so absent clear language to this effect.

---

180. See supra text accompanying notes 146–152.

181. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1332(d)(3) (2006).

182. 28 U.S.C.A. § 1332(d)(4) (2006).

183. See Abrego Abrego v. Dow Chem. Co., 443 F.3d 676, 684 (9th Cir. 2006) (noting that in construing CAFA courts should be mindful that “[g]iven the care taken in CAFA to reverse certain established principles but not others, the usual presumption that Congress legislates against an understanding of pertinent legal principles has particular force”).

CONCLUSION

Each of the arguments that has been credited by courts as grounds for finding Congress intended to shift the burden of jurisdictional proof seem far less supportable when subjected to closer scrutiny.

The plaintiff will sometimes have better access to jurisdictional proof, but not always. In any event, this argument seems less an attempt to divine legislative intent in the statute than a patent policy judgment best left to lawmakers. Reliance on legislative history similarly lacks foundational credence. No court that has turned to legislative history has convincingly made the case that any language in the statute is sufficiently ambiguous to justify doing so. There is a surreal inconsistency in watching courts readily dismiss as unreliable the same Senate Committee Report published after the statute's enactment as to other questions of statutory interpretation but not hesitate in drawing on it as evidence of Congress's intent to shift the burden of proof as to §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4). Worse still, though, are arguments that find justification for burden shifting in CAFA's spirit and its colorful "Findings and Purposes."<sup>184</sup> Untethered, if not disdainful of the actual text that was enacted into law, this argument seems little different from treating Congress's passage of the statute as a blank check on which the most expansionist hopes and dreams of CAFA's proponents can endlessly draw.

While not all courts have been swayed by these previous arguments, all courts—even including the few that have refused to ultimately find Congress intended any burden shift—have thought the Court's decision in Breuer v. Jim's Concrete of Brevard, Inc. is on point.<sup>185</sup> On this view, if §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) are "exceptions" to a separate grant of jurisdiction, then Breuer commands the conclusion that Congress intended to shift the burden of proof as to these provisions onto the party trying to establish their applicability.

We saw, however, that the line cited from Breuer has no application to this statutory context. The Court in Breuer meant only that the best reading of § 1441 is that the burden should be on the plaintiff to show this is one of those rare instances when Congress expressly intended to grant original jurisdiction to the district courts without giving a corresponding right to remove to the defendant. Taking the line from Breuer literally and without any consideration to context, one can see its applicability to the CAFA burden of proof problem. But reading naked sentences from an opinion is dangerous business, as even the Fifth Circuit has observed in addressing a related CAFA question.<sup>186</sup>

---

184. Morgan v. Gay, 471 F.3d 469, 473 (3d Cir. 2006).

185. See, e.g., Evans v. Walter Indus., Inc., 449 F.3d 1159, 1164 (11th Cir. 2006).

186. Preston v. Tenet Healthsystem Mem'l Med. Ctr., Inc., 485 F.3d 793, 800 (5th Cir. 2007) (rejecting plaintiffs' reading of a case as grounds for using a different method of determining domicile for purposes of applying one of the carve-out provisions in CAFA and observing that plaintiffs' "proposed approach for determining citizenship gives undue attention to the naked statements of law as opposed to the substance of the relevant opinions").

My reading of the statutory text departs from the prevailing view. It does not aid thinking to characterize §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) as “exceptions.” Even if they were so intended, Breuer does not command a burden shift and, further, fails to account for the burden that is regularly placed on defendants to prove the inapplicability of other common exceptions to removal authority. In any event, the predicate assumption that §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) represent “exceptions” to the grant of jurisdiction in (d)(2) falls apart as soon as one reads the whole statute and realizes that Congress knew how to write exceptions into the statute and did so in other places.

The better way to read the statute is to regard the mandatory language in § 1332(d)(4), along with the provisions in (d)(5) and (d)(9), as nonwaivable jurisdictional rules. As such, the party desiring to remain in federal court bears the ultimate burden of persuasion to show that the court has jurisdiction and that none of the mandatory carve outs to jurisdiction otherwise apply. Concededly, the phrasing in (d)(4) is peculiar. Rather than look at the word “decline” in isolation, we should (i) focus on the whole, mandatory phrase, “shall decline,” which is an unlikely formulation if the rule was meant to be waivable by parties, inadvertently or at their choosing; and acknowledge the legislative choice to craft the provision (ii) without familiar waiver language (such as “Upon timely motion of a party . . . the district court shall [decline jurisdiction]”)<sup>187</sup> and (iii) in such a way that it indisputably is directed at marking a category of cases to which the statute does not apply. All this suggests that the better reading of (d)(4) is that the party who wants to be in federal court must prove it does not apply in order to satisfy his burden of persuasion as to the court’s jurisdiction.

This raises a question mark as to § 1332(d)(3). But, because there is no other credible way to characterize the mandatory carve-outs, because §§ 1332(d)(3) and (d)(4) are obviously meant to fit together closely, and because we must assume Congress legislates with an awareness of existing law and, as such, would probably not have used such plainly jurisdictional language (or would have been explicit if it had intended to bring about a shift in the jurisdictional burden), the better conclusion is that Congress did not intend to shift the burden of proof as to any of these provisions in CAFA.

There are few subjects that are as important—and divisive—a part of the American legal and social landscape as class action litigation.<sup>188</sup> The question of the jurisdictional burden of proof is one of the most important CAFA interpretative questions with which the courts are now engaged; the empirical evidence gathered in the Appendix underlines the virtually dispo-

---

187. 28 U.S.C. § 1334(c)(2) (2000).

188. See Deborah R. Hensler, Revisiting the Monster: New Myths and Realities of Class Action and Other Large Scale Litigation, 11 DUKE J. COMP. & INT’L L. 179, 212 (2001) (“In the United States, many see the class action rule as the key to opening the monster’s cage and setting it free. . . . The great question facing civil justice regimes in the United States and elsewhere is what the role of the judiciary should be in responding to large-scale harms.” (referencing Arthur R. Miller, Of Frankenstein Monsters and Shining Knights: Myth, Reality, and the “Class Action,” 92 HARV. L. REV. 644 (1979))).

sitive nature of a shift in the burden of jurisdictional proof.<sup>189</sup> For this reason alone, we may be excused for dwelling so long on these technical questions of statutory meaning and application. The proper allocation of jurisdictional proof under the statute is a vital interpretative question precisely because it is one of the key post-enactment developments that have made the new class action statute as consequential as early studies have already shown it to be.<sup>190</sup>

---

189. See supra note 6 and Appendix.

190. See THOMAS E. WILLGING & EMERY G. LEE III, THE IMPACT OF THE CLASS ACTION FAIRNESS ACT OF 2005 ON THE FEDERAL COURTS: THIRD INTERIM REPORT TO THE JUDICIAL CONFERENCE ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON CIVIL RULES (2007). The report's authors summarize their main findings as follows:

In the sixteen months since CAFA went into effect on February 18, 2005, [] we find a substantial increase in class action activity based on diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. Given that one of the legislation's primary purposes was to expand the diversity jurisdiction of the federal courts, it is likely that much of this observed increase in diversity removals and, of particular interest, original proceedings in the federal courts is attributable to CAFA.

Id. at 2; see also Edward F. Sherman, Decline and Fall, A.B.A. J., June 2007, at 51 (remarking that following CAFA's passage "the consumer class action has reached a crucial juncture, and the direction that courts and legislatures take over the next few years will likely determine whether it has any kind of viable future").

APPENDIX

Table 1: Shift in Burden of Jurisdictional Proof Under 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1332(d)(3), (d)(4), (d)(5), (d)(9) (2006)

Case Citation	Burden Shift?	Result
Scott v. Ing Clarion Partners, LLC, No. C IVA 1:06CV1843 RLV, 2006 WL 3191184 (N.D. Ga. Oct. 31, 2006).	Yes	Motion to remand denied.
Eakins v. Pella Corp., 455 F. Supp. 2d 450 (E.D.N.C. 2006).	Yes	Motion to remand denied.
Sullivan v. State Farm & Cas. Co., No. 06-1677, 2006 WL 2119320 (E.D. La. Apr. 6, 2006).	Does Not Resolve	Motion to remand granted.
Escoe v. State Farm Fire & Cas. Co., No. 07-1123, 2007 WL 1207231 (E.D. La. Apr. 23, 2007).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Robinson v. Cheetah Transp., No. Civ. A 06-0005, 2006 WL 468820 (W.D. La. Feb. 27, 2006).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Preston v. Tenet Healthsystem Mem'l Med. Ctr., Inc., 485 F.3d 793 (5th Cir. 2007).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Preston v. Tenet Healthsystem Mem'l Med. Ctr., Inc., 485 F.3d 804 (5th Cir. 2007).	Yes	Motion to remand granted
Serrano v. 180 Connect, Inc., 478 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir. 2007).	Yes	No final outcome—sent back to lower district court to reconsider remand motion in light of appellate ruling on allocation of burden
Hart v. FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc., 457 F.3d 675 (7th Cir. 2006).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Frazier v. Pioneer Ams. LLC, 455 F.3d 542 (5th Cir. 2006).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Evans v. Walter Indus., Inc., 449 F.3d 1159 (11th Cir. 2006).	Yes	Motion to remand denied

2008]

Burdens of Jurisdictional Proof

449

Case Citation	Burden Shift?	Result
Martin v. Lafon Nursing Facility of the Holy Family, No. 06-5108, 2007 WL 162813 (E.D. La. Jan. 18, 2007).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Morris v. TJX Cos., 493 F. Supp. 2d 158 (D. Mass. 2007).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Garcia v. Boyar & Miller, P.C., No. 3:06-CV-1936-D, 2007 WL 1556961 (N.D. Tex. May 30, 2007).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Mattera v. Clear Channel Commc'ns, Inc., 239 F.R.D. 70 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).	Yes	Motion to dismiss granted (suit initiated by Plaintiff in federal court; so motion by defendant to dismiss)
Kitson v. Bank of Edwardsville, No. 06-528-GPM, 2006 WL 3392752 (S.D. Ill. Nov. 22, 2006).	Yes	Motion to remand granted
Lowery v. Ala. Power Co., 483 F.3d 1184 (11th Cir. 2007).	Yes (though in dicta only)	Motion to remand granted but not on exceptions grounds: concludes that threshold jurisdictional requirements not satisfied by defendant
Caruso v. All State Ins. Co., 469 F. Supp. 2d 364 (E.D. La. 2007).	Yes	Remand denied.
Murray v. Ruby Tuesday, Inc., No. CV207-050, 2007 WL 2284542 (S.D. Ga. Aug. 3, 2007).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Kendrick v. Standard Fire Ins. Co., No. 06-141-DLB, 2007 WL 1035018 (E.D. Ky. Mar. 31, 2007).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Genton v. Vestin Realty Mortg. II, Inc., No. 06cv2517-BEN (WMC), 2007 WL 951838 (S.D. Cal. Mar. 9, 2007).	Yes	Motion to remand granted
Gauntt v. La. Citizens Prop. Ins. Corp., No. 06-7817, 2007 WL 128801 (E.D. La. Jan. 16, 2007).	Yes	Motion to remand denied

Case Citation	Burden Shift?	Result
Schwartz v. Comcast Corp., No. Civ. A. 05-2340, 2005 WL 1799414 (E.D. Pa. Jul. 28, 2005).	No resolution	No relevant finding
In re Textainer P'ship Sec. Litig., No. C 05-0969 MMC, WL 1791559 (N.D. Cal. Jul. 27, 2005).	Yes	Motion to remand granted
Waitt v. Merck & Co., No. C05-0759L, 2005 WL 1799740 (W.D. Wash. July 27, 2005).	Yes	Motion to remand denied
Berry v. Am. Express Pub. Corp., 381 F. Supp. 2d 1118 (C.D. Cal. 2005).	Yes (in dicta)	Motion to remand granted.

2008]

Burdens of Jurisdictional Proof

451

Table 2: No Shift in Burden of Jurisdictional Proof Under 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1332(d)(3), (d)(4), (d)(5), (d)(9) (2006)

Case Citation	NO BOP Shift; Burden on party seeking federal court	Result
Kearns v. Ford Motor Co., No. CV 05-5644 GAF (JTLX), WL 3967998 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 21, 2005).	No	Motion to remand denied
Lao v. Wickes Furniture Co., 455 F. Supp. 2d 1045 (C.D. Cal. 2006).	No	Motion to remand granted
Hirschbach v. NVE Bank, 496 F. Supp. 2d 451 (D.N.J. 2007).	No resolution	Motion to remand granted
Coy Chiropractic Health Ctr., Inc. v. Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co., No. 06-cv-678-DRH, 2007 WL 2122420 (S.D. Ill. Jul. 20, 2007).	No	Motion to remand granted
Schwartz v. Comcast Corp, No. Civ. A. 05-2340, 2006 WL 487915 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 28, 2006).	No	Motion to remand denied
Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Jones, No. 1:07 CV 728, 2007 WL 2236618 (N.D. Ohio Jul. 31, 2007).	No	Motion to remand granted
Serrano v. 180 Connect, Inc., No. C 06-1363 TEH, 2006 WL 2348888 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 11, 2006).	No	Motion to remand granted
Estate of Barbara Pew v. Cardarelli, No. 5:05-CV-1317, 2006 WL 3524488 (N.D.N.Y. Dec. 6, 2006).	No	Motion to remand granted
Davis v. Chase Bank U.S.A., 453 F. Supp. 2d 1205 (C.D. Cal. 2006).	No Resolution	District Court retained jurisdiction
Keltner v. Krystle Towers, LLC, No. 2:05-CV-1126-BES-RJJ, 2006 WL 1663547 (D. Nev. June 7, 2006).	No	Motion to remand granted

452

Alabama Law Review

[Vol. 59:2:409]

Case Citation	NO BOP Shift; Burden on party seeking federal court	Result
Napolitano v. Krystle Towers, LLC, No. 2:05-CV-829-BES-GWF, 2006 WL 1582140 (D. Nev. June 6, 2006).	No	Motion to remand granted